"I dunno—boat, I reckon. Yes, it is a boat, and I'm aboard of it. Come on."

"Are there any Chinamen in it?" I asked, feeling a strong distaste for making any new acquaintances just at that time.

"Hold on till I claw round a bit and I can tell you better;" and an interval of silence ensued.

"What say, are there any Chinamen aboard?" I screamed again, impatient of the delay.

"No, come along, don't be frightened."

I was shortly alongside, and clambering over the gunwale, found myself in one of the ordinary, open Chinese lighter boats, over the after end of which was a small bamboo roof, where I found Rory snugly coiled away, and where I soon seated myself beside him. The pouring rain, which still continued with unabated violence, had filled the boat something more than half full, so that in setting down under the roof, although sheltered from the rain, we were up to our waists in water.

It would have been a comical sight—had a sight been possible in that Egyptian darkness—to have seen us sitting there, soaked through, bareheaded and barefooted and half submerged, as we filled and emptied boots full of water through the long, dark hours. While thus occupied, we heard a sound from the shore.

"Chinamen, by thunder!" cried Rory, and we listened anxiously; but our fears were speedily dissipated by a volley of Dutch oaths.

It was Johnson, undoubtedly, but whether alone, or a prisoner to the Chinamen, we of course had no means of knowing. In the event of the latter being the case, it was better to remain silent; but compassion for our shipmate induced us to venture a low whistle. It was immediately returned.

"Is that you, Johnson?" hailed Rory.

"The undersigned entertains the opinion that it isn't anybody else, only there's less of him by about forty or fifty teeth than there was a while ago. Where have ye stowed yourselves?"

I was about to caution Johnson about the river, when Rory, enjoining silence, called out:

"Only out here a few steps, come right along."

A few steps, a heavy souze, and an angry spluttering and swearing soon followed.

"You don't mean to say you are overboard?" said Rory, with feigned surprise; "what a pity to wet your clothes, to be sure!"

"Pretty fellows, aint you, to step out and leave a chap? You should have stayed and seen it out," said Johnson, as he climbed over the side.

"How the deuce did you manage to get away from the cutthroats?" I asked.

"How did I get away? I made them run, every mother's son of 'em."

"Did you indeed, now? do tell us; which way did they run?" asked Rory.

"O, never mind which way; I made 'em run, and that's enough. Have either of you any idea what time of night it is? If it's before twelve, the tide is running out, and would take us away from the ship; but if it's past midnight, the current would set us right up towards Whampoa, if we were to cut the painter."

"My chronometer has run down," said Rory. "It may be ten at night, or three in the morning, for me. All I know is, that it has been a full month since I left the ship."

Another half hour removed our doubts upon the point, for a faint light began to show in the east; so slipping the painter, we made such good use of our oars, that by sunrise we were alongside our vessel. It was lucky for us that we had nothing to do but sleep that day.

GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.

There is gold enough in California to employ the labor of centuries, but it can no longer be obtained as formerly. The time has gone past in that country for making fortunes by the simple pick-axe, spade and pan—by hard labor. Machinery and capital are now required for obtaining the royal metal. The character of California mining is entirely changed since 1850. Shafts have now to be sunk to an immense depth, tunnels run far into the mountains, extensive dams erected, and flumes carried from rock to rock, over deep valleys and extensive ravines. All this requires capital and combined labor. In Nevada County—an extensive field for quartz mining operations—there are sixteen quartz mills in successful operation; five are run by water, and the others by steam and horse power. About $2,000,000 are invested in this kind of mining. This amount will be doubled in a few years, for it is proved beyond dispute, that quartz veins are not only remunerative but inexhaustible. There is, before our country now, fields of gold mining of boundless extent, and exhaustless produce; therefore, the gold interests of the United States are the greatest in the world, with perhaps but one exception, those of Australia.—Mining Magazine.

SECRET OF WEALTH.

Amos and Abbott Lawrence began life poor. They determined that the strictest integrity should pervade every business transaction until their dying hour—and it was so. Among the results are the accumulation of millions of money, the possession of a name for mercantile integrity worth more to them, to their children, to their age and nation, than a title to a dukedom; while they did, during life, and at death, institute charities, which will heap sweet blessings on their name and memory for ages yet to come.—Transcript.

Man doubles all the evils of his fate by pondering over them; a scratch becomes a wound, a slight an injury, a jest an insult, a small peril a great danger; and a slight illness often ends in death by brooding apprehensions.

INSPIRATION.

BY IRENE MONTAGUE.

Ye pretty, twin chamols-skin loves,
I purchased at Stewart's last week!
Command ye my muse, pretty gloves,
With digits expressive and meek.
O say, did ye ken, pretty gloves,
On amateur's hands ye would go?
To canter a steed on the roads,
Or trot a muse balky and slow?

Ye pretty, twin chamols-skin loves!
I christen with ink spots your digits;
Just hear, O equestrians, how gloves
Are magic to banish the fidgets.
I roamed away off—for they said,
J'étais très mécontent here at home;
And the while I was absent—muse fled!
And still she continues to roam.

Ye pretty, twin chamols skin loves,
Entice ye the truant jade back!
She'll curvette and dance, but these gloves
Will soon curb her down to the track.
Aujourd'hui, je pense que la terre;
Is paradise fit for the loves;
Dull cannis can't make me despair,
While dreaming o'er you, pretty gloves.

Old Sol has just burst from a cloud,
The birds sing melodious strain;
Blithe hope is curvetting so proud,
My spirits are mounting again!
Like rustle of banner unfurling,
Or rippling of waves on the sea,
Young leaflets to breezes uncurling,
Floats music of motion o'er me!

O, give to me wings! I would sail
In a spirit-shalp over the foam!
Mon Dieu! if it blows up a gale,
I pray to be somewhere near home!
No, no! 'tis a courser, I mean!
My riding-cap, whip, and my gloves!
I've not had a race yet this spring,
Ye pretty, twin chamols-skin loves!

THE BLACK CHARGER.

BY HARRIET A. DAVISON.

THE incidents I am about to relate happened many years ago in the south of England, in Hampshire county. Not many of the inhabitants remember the story; but there are one or two aged women, who, if questioned, will give an account like this. The country is so much more thickly populated that I cannot now tell you the exact spot where stood the house of Lord Heatherton, but it was a plain, gray, stone house, built in the Elizabethan style which we who live in the times of the revival of gothic and Italian architecture would scarcely have called handsome, though in those days it was considered very elegant. The house stood upon a hill which sloping very gradually to the south, formed a beautiful lawn belted with large trees. A few days before the commencement of my story, the household of Lord Heatherton had been thrown into great terror and trouble, for he had started upon a favorite black horse, Gaylad, to go to visit a friend who lived two days' ride distant, and at the end of the third day his steed had galloped riderless to the door of the stable. The horse was reeking with sweat, covered with dust and foam, and the very darkest suspicions were entertained that some foul deed had been perpetrated, for there was the mark of a bloody hand upon the saddle, and deep stains upon the bridle. The old gray-headed Scotch hostler, when Lady Mary, Lord Heatherton's wife, expressed her fears that her lord had been thrown, shook his head as he replied:

"It couldna ha' been his ain black, lady. Na, na, I ken him fu' weel. He wadna do it. O, waur, waur ha' happened my ain lord," and with tears in his eyes he re-entered the stable.

Every inquiry was made. The friend whom Lord Heatherton had gone to see, stated that the second day, late in the afternoon, Lord Heatherton had reached his house, where he spent the night, and early the next day he had started upon his return, apparently in good health and excellent spirits. No; all was mystery. Search where they might, no tidings of the missing lord could be found, and his wife and son mourned for him as one dead. About a week after the sudden disappearance of Lord Heatherton, his son William, mounted upon Gaylad, the black horse, started to go and see the same friend his father had visited at the time of his death. It was early morning when William started, and he travelled slowly along, stopping once to rest himself and beast, and wait until a heavy shower passed over. It was towards the close of the afternoon that he came to a fork in the road, one leading to a small straggling hamlet and the other diverging through a piece of forest. The October sun just then shone bright and warm through the clouds, and William decided upon the wooded road. When once beneath the trees, he loosed his rein and allowed his steed to walk. Becoming wholly absorbed in his thoughts, he was suddenly aroused by the stopping of his horse, and upon looking round was surprised to find that Gaylad, usually so trusty and true, had struck into the woods and was standing at the foot of a tree. He had hardly time to recover from his surprise, when he was yet more astonished by the strange behaviour of his horse who began to whinny faintly and tear up the turf with his hoofs. For a moment, William Heatherton was undecided what course to pursue. Feeling sure that some mystery was connected with that spot and the horse, he rode back to the road and took a side path leading both away from the road and the spot, and when once well away from the spot he again gave his horse his head, who immediately dashed through the trees and with unerring instinct, reached the same spot at the foot of the great tree and began to tear up the ground with his hoofs. Determined to solve the mystery, William regained the road, and retraced his steps until he reached a little cottage which he had remarked standing at the entrance of the wood, where he obtained the assistance of an old man and his son, and allowing Gaylad to be the guide, they reached the spot, where his horse repeated his strange behaviour.

"Please your honor," said the oldest man, "yer horse knows more than us. There is something underneath the sod the beast wants to get at. Shall we dig, sir?"

William directed them to proceed, and with feverish impatience watched their labors. Not a great while had they dug, when they simultaneously uttered a cry of horror, and looking, William Heatherton saw the body of his father lying in the cavity, with his clothes torn, and a ghastly wound in his throat. Sadly they raised him from the earth and placed him upon their shoulders, the black horse following, perfectly quiet, with drooping tail and head.

"Sure," exclaimed the oldest man, "it's the same gentleman who stopped at my house a week or more ago and asked for a glass of water, and gave my little Molly a bright gold piece; and he seemed very much pleased with the child, and said he would come back in a day or two, and he never did; for little Molly, who is lame, sir, often asks when the kind gentleman is coming back."

William said nothing, though he heard all the man said, for he was busy with his own thoughts. They had reached the cottage, and the remains of Lord Heatherton were borne in and laid on a rude pallet. Night was already closing in, and, resisting their urgent offers to stay, William, after putting a considerable sum of money into the old man's hand, and enjoining upon them perfect secrecy, mounted his horse and rode away. He had come to the outskirts of the hamlet, and began to think he had better have taken up with the farmer's offer, when he came to an inn, before which creaked and hung an old sign. Riding up to the door, William dismounted, and throwing the reins upon the neck of his horse, entered the house. The outside door opened directly into a large square room, which seemed to answer the treble purposes of parlor, kitchen and bar-room. Behind the bar stood a dark-browed, middle-aged man, who was mixing drinks for a few hard-featured, forlorn-looking men, who made off as soon as served. Stepping up to the bar, William asked for somebody to take his horse, for he intended to stay there that night. The bar-keeper apologized for making the gentleman wait, but his hostler was gone; and if the gentleman would be so kind as to wait until he had finished serving his customers, he would take his horse. William went out and led the horse into the stable, then returned to the bar-room to wait till the man was at leisure. The man went out, and after a few minutes returned, looking somewhat pale and excited.

"Please, sir," he said, "your horse seems very vicious, and I dare not touch him. Will you please come and see to him?"

William rose, rather wondering what freak now Gaylad had got into, for he was usually perfectly gentle to handle. He entered the stable and found the horse perfectly quiet, and he called to the inn-keeper, who loitered outside, to come in. No sooner did he enter than Gaylad began to show signs of the greatest rage and fear; he crouched against the side of the stall, trembling violently; his eyes dilated and wild, ears back and nostrils widely distended. In a peremptory tone, William ordered the man to approach and take hold of the horse, but upon his doing so the horse struck at him furiously with his fore feet, and he fell back. In a quiet tone, William spoke of the horse as having vicious fits sometimes, gave the man permission to go into the house, and attended to Gaylad himself. In a few minutes he returned to the inn and ordered supper, which was served by a slatternly servant girl.

When he had finished, he stepped up to the bar to pay his bill, and saying that he must go farther to-night, handed the man a crown to change. In the till there was barely two shillings, so the man drew from under the counter a heavy iron box, which he opened, and William, who was watching every movement, bent forward and saw in the box his father's watch and seals.

"Villain!" he exclaimed; and before the man could recover himself, he had sprung over the counter and knocked him down. The wretch swore violently and struggled to get free; but William was agile and very strong, and he held him there. Finding his efforts all in vain, he ceased swearing and prayed for mercy. Hearing the cries, two stragglers stepped in and helped William to secure the man.

"It's all come of that cursed horse," groaned the man. "I knowed the devil was in him when I tried to catch him in the wood, and he sprang away from me like such a wild thing. If I could have killed him I'd not have been here."

Sadly William returned home with the remains of his father; but with the bitter pain was mingled a feeling of relief that the sad end had been discovered. Before the time of trial, the inn-keeper was found dead, having strangled himself. In after years, when William had won for himself a gentle wife, and merry children played through the halls, there a fond caress was daily given to THE BLACK CHARGER.

I DON'T DANCE.

A plain unlettered man came from the back country, in the State of Alabama, to Tusculooosa, and on the Sabbath went early to church. He had been accustomed to attend meetings in school-houses and private dwellings, where each one appropriated to himself the first seat which he found unoccupied. He selected there a convenient slip, and awaited patiently the assembling of the congregation. The services commenced. Presently the music of a full-toned organ burst upon his astonished ear; he had never heard one before. At the same time the gentleman who owned the slip came up the aisle with his lady leaning upon his arm. As he approached the door of the slip, he motioned for the countryman to come out, in order to give place to the lady. This movement the countryman did not comprehend; and from the situation of the gentleman and lady, associated as it was in his mind with the music, he immediately concluded that cotillon, or French contra dance, or some other dance was intended. Rising partly from his seat, he said to the gentleman, who was still beckoning to him: "Excuse me, sir—excuse me, if you please—I don't dance!"—Tusculooosa Herald.

HABIT OF COMPLAINING.

"How are you, Trepid? How do you feel?"
"A great deal worse than I was, thank'ee; most dead, I'm obliged to you; I'm always worse than I was, and I don't think I was ever any better. I'm very sure, anyhow, I'm not going to be any better; and for the future you may always know I'm worse, without asking any questions; for the question makes me worse, if nothing else does."

"Why, Trepid, what's the matter with you?"
"Nothing, I tell you, in particular, but a great deal is the matter with me in general; and that's the danger, because we don't know what it is. That's what kills people, when they can't tell what it is; that's what's killing me. My grandfather died of it, and so will I. The doctors don't know; they can't tell; they say I'm well enough when I'm bad enough, and so there's no help. I'm going off some of these days right after my grandfather, dying of nothing in particular, but of everything in general. That's what finishes our folks."—Charcoal Sketches.

AN EXTRAORDINARY STORY.

A merchant appeared in the commercial walks of Liverpool, where, deep in the mysteries of cotton and corn, a constant attendant at church, a subscriber to local charities, and a giver of good dinners, he was much respected. The hospitalities of the house were gracefully dispensed by his niece. But at length it became whispered that his speculations were not successful; and it was necessary for him to borrow money. This he did upon the security of property belonging to his niece. A certain amount of secrecy was necessary for the sake of his credit, and the Liverpool underwriters readily assented. He insured her life with at least ten different merchants or underwriters for £2000 each; and the same game was again played over. The lady was taken ill, the doctor was sent for, and found her in convulsions. A specific was administered, but in the course of the night he was again summoned, but arrived too late. Next morning it was known all over Liverpool that she had died suddenly. The body lay in state, and the merchant retained his position, and bore himself with decent dignity under his affliction. He made no immediate application for the money and scarcely alluded to it; but he had selected his victims with skill. They were safe and honorable men, and he duly received his £20,000. From this period he appeared to decline in health, and was recommended a change of climate. He went abroad, and with him his clever partner, who possessed the wonderful power of simulating death, and deceiving the medical men.—Anecdotes of Insurance.

THE LEOPARD'S ATTACK.

The power of a leopard is wonderful in proportion to his weight. I have seen a full-grown bull with his neck broken by the leopard who attacked it. It is the popular belief that the effect is produced by a blow of the paw. This is not the case; it is not simply the blow, but it is the combination of the weight, the power, and the momentum of the spring which renders the effect of a leopard's attack so surprising. Few leopards rush boldly to the attack like a dog; they stalk their game and advance crouchingly, making use of every object that will cover them, until they are within a few bounds of their prey. Then the immense power of muscle is displayed in the concentrated energy of the spring; he flies through the air and settles on the throat, usually throwing his own body over the animal, while his teeth and claws are fixed on the neck; this is the manner in which the spine of the animal is broken, by a sudden spring, and not by a blow. The blow from the paw is, nevertheless, immensely powerful, and at one stroke will rip open a bullock like a knife; but the after effects of the wound are still more to be dreaded than the force of the blow. There is a peculiar poison in the claw, which is highly dangerous. This is caused by the putrid flesh which they are constantly tearing, and which is apt to cause gangrene by inoculation.—Eight Years' Wanderings in Ceylon.

It is useless to recommend to people a course which they have not judgment to pursue.

THE MAGNOLIA.

BY MRS. M. W. CUNYNE.

Lovely flower, whose beauteous bloom
Fills the air with sweet perfume,
Dreams of beauty thou hast shed,
From thy grassy, verdant bed,
Erat of leaves bereft and sore,
Rising from cold winter's bier,
From the snows and frozen rain—
Mantling all the dreary plain.

Spring time gave to thee new life,
With bright hues and fragrance rise;
Leaves and heaven-tinted flowers
Sweetly gild the fleeting hours.
Thou wilt fade—the fadeless never:
Flowers immortal bloom forever;
These are found where angels dwell,
And all the flowers of earth exal.

If our earth is lovely here,
How must brighter worlds appear?
In immortal verdure drest—
By no mortal footstep pressed.
There, all-healing leaflets grow,
And pure crystal waters flow;
There, celestial flowerets fair
With their fragrance fill the air.

There, no chilling grasp of death
Stills the heart or clogs the breath;
Change may not come in that bright land
By the life-giving sephyr fanned;
There, cherished hopes are realized,
With the dear ones so fondly prized;
Yet, brightest dreams of life can ne'er
Picture that world so wondrous fair.

SIM LANGFORD'S CHOICE.

BY ELLEN ALICE MORIARTY.

"How on airth Sim Langford came to like me is more than I ever could tell," said Mrs. Langford, pausing a moment from her work, and giving, as it were, a searching glance into the past.

It was an unsatisfactory one; the great secret remained unpenetrated; and her eyes turned again to the meadow, back of the house, where her husband was busy with the mowers. He had just passed the window, and my involuntary expression of admiration—for Simon Langford was as fine a specimen of manhood in its vigorous prime as any one would like to see, and be the better afterward for seeing—had aroused the old inquiry in her mind to be as yet unanswered. In truth, she was not the only one who wondered when Simon Langford took for a wife one of the smallest and plainest girls in Weston—and Weston was famous for its pretty girls—who, besides the happy consciousness of being cherished by him, as only a noble heart knows how to cherish an affectionate and faithful wife, had the pleasing gratification of being mistress of the finest farm in Norfolk county.

"If I have not a talent for investigation, Mrs. Langford," said I, "I confess a weakness for anything mysterious. Let me hear all about the courtship, and we may arrive at some conclusion. Two heads are better than one, they say."

"The courtship! Bless your heart, child, there was no courtship at all. Or if there was, it wasn't like all other ones. I don't mind telling you if you don't let Sal know it; for it was an orful disappointment to her when Sim married me."

Sal was a maiden sister of Mrs. Langford, a tall, bony woman, with a sour, sallow, discontented looking visage.

"You see," she continued, "when Sal was a young gal, she was a rale beauty. Tall and straight, with as bright an eye and red a cheek as you'd see anywhere. There were five sisters of us, and all were pretty excepting me; and mother used to say how I was the very picture of Aunt Jerushy, who lived and died without ever having a feller arter her. Well, Sim came down to his uncle's, when their boy, Nathan Standish, went to Bosting, and the first night he came to singing-school he began to make up to Sal. She was e'en a-most tickled to deth at the notice he took on her, and when her old feller, Silas Green, came to go home with her, she tossed her head with sich a look, and 'I'm engaged, sir,' sez she, and taking hold on Sim's arm, off she walked. Poor Silas looked as if all the blood in his body dashed right up in his face; and there he stood staring arter them, while the gals and the fellers snickered right out. Arter that, nothing was talked of but Sim and Sal; and the gals, as they always are, were mighty jealous; for Sim took the shine out of every feller completely, and even my sisters, that were allers good-natured, turned agin her, and there was nothing but snapping and scolding in the house from morning till night. I can't tell how it was, but there was such a way about that Sim you could not help loving him, and wishing that he cared for you. He was sich a han'sum feller; and then his voice went through your heart like music. Lawr! I used to be all over in a tremble whenever he spoke to me. I was no more than sixteen when he first came, and if my heart did not go right out to meet him, and if he hasn't got it yet, my name aint Mirandy. Whenever Sim was at the house, our gals, to plague Sal, would never go out of the room, but would sit there all dressed out, and hardly let Sim have a chance to talk to her. One night ma'am came in, and says Sim, to please her:

"'Mrs. Cole,' says he, 'I don't wonder that your gals are so han'sum when I look at you.'

"'Wall,' says ma'am, tickled of course at his fine speech, 'that's mighty kind of you, Mr. Langford. The gals are purty good to look at, excepting Mirandy. She's the perfect picture of Aunt Jerushy, who never had a feller in the world.'

"'How unkind in your mother, Mrs. Langford,' I exclaimed. 'Were you not greatly mortified? And before him, too.'

"'Well,' answered the good woman, with that charming simplicity that I am certain won for her the love of Simon Langford, 'ma'am was used to saying it; it came kind of natural to her. The gals burst out a-laffing, and Sal the blindest. Sim colored up. I could see that he felt for me, but he didn't know what to say. So sez I:

"'Laugh away, gals; 'tis well for ye to have me.'

"'And why so?' sez Sal, her quick temper firing up.

"'For the same reason, Sal,' says I, 'that makes dad, when he wants to show off his best dows, put that ugly, crooked-backed Millie among them—to make them look better for the contrast.'

"'And you are not ugly or crooked-backed, Mirandy,' sez Sim, springing up and catching my hand in both of his. 'And if I was a woman, I'd ten thousand times sooner be ugly and crooked-backed with a disposition as good as yourn, than a beauty with a bad temper.'

"'Lawr! he didn't mean Sal, but she took it to herself, for she was rale passionate; and bursting right out crying, she flounced out of the room. If crooked-backed Millie had broke in through the winder, pitched Sim over her head and cleared out agin the way she came, he couldn't have looked more surprised.

"'She thought you meant herself,' sez Becky, giggling; and it was rale mean of her to say so, because it let Sim know what a pecky cross thing Sal was.

"'But lawr! Sim didn't care, and the next day they were as loving as ever.

"'Who should come down but Uncle Thaxter soon arter this, and when he was going home to Bosting, he said he'd carry Sal with him to see the sights. If Sal wasn't tickled! and off she went, promising to be allers thinking of Sim, and all that kind of nonsense—cos it is rale nonsense when folks don't mean it, and Sal, for one, didn't. Somehow, Sim never liked the other gals; he seed they were all jealous of Sal, and whenever he came to the house to hear about her, he allers asked for me. Now when a gal cares for a feller, and he likes some one else, she can't close her heart agin him on that account. She keeps on loving him, without any hope to be sure, but still loving him, and I sint the only one that can tell you that. 'Twas just the way with me. I knew as well as I knew my A B C's that Sim didn't care the pod of a pea for me, but still I couldn't help a-lovin him. One night, sez he, 'I'm a-going to Bosting to-morrow, Mirandy.'

"'What on airth is carrying you there?' says I. 'To see, Sal?' And if the words didn't stick in my throat, and all I could do couldn't keep the tears from rushing into my eyes. We were standing at the gate, for he came from the singing school with me. The moonlight was shining full on my face, and when I looked up Sim was staring pretty sharp at me.

"'Here are the gals,' says he.

"'And sure enough, Becky and the rest of the gals were coming down the road.

"'Yes,' sez I, 'and their fellers with them.'

"'Never mind, Mirandy,' sez he, 'you are worth the hull on 'em.' And afore I could say a word, he caught me in his arms, gin me a hearty kiss and cleared off across the fields.

"'He meant that for Sal,' sez I to myself, but somehow, that night, my heart wasn't a sad one.

"'About four days arter that, dad was going to Bosting with some prime butter that ma'am made, and he allers was fondest of me, so he took me along with him in the wagon. We started early in the morning, and got to Bosting in the arternoon. We were driving along one of the streets when, all on a sudden, dad catches my arm and busts out a-laffing.

"'Look, Mirandy,' sez he; 'if that gal aint for all the world like a peacock with its tail spread out!'

"'On the sidewalk in front of us were a fellow and a gal. He was like the rest of the city fellers, rigged out like them every day in go-to-meeting clothes, and swinging a little painted twig in his hand for a cane. But the gal. O lawr! I'd thought I'd die looking at her. She had on a red and yaller striped muslin dress, that swept the walk as clean as a broom, a blue and yaller shawl, and a white bonnet stuck all over with flowers. Lawr! it was not the way she was dressed so much as the way she walked that made me laff. 'Twasn't walking; 'twas a kind of wriggling along, as if all the conceit in creation was packed up in her individual body, and it was a trying to get out. Dad made Andrew Jackson—our horse—walk slow, so as to keep up with them, and suddenly dad sez, 'If there aint Sim Langford!'

"I saw Sim coming agin us a few minutes afore dad spoke; but my heart got into such a beating spell at the sight of him, I couldn't say a word.

"He'll be sarting to know the wagon,' sez dad.

"The wagon was a green kivered one, with red wheels, so 'twas easy for him to know it; but he never looked at the wagon, but walked past the feller and the gal, stepping out as he went by 'em as straight and as stiff as a militia man on a training day.

"Something aint right with that feller,' sez dad. 'He's got a heavy heart, and is trying to hide it. Look here, Mirandy, if ever you see a feller walking along as if his backbone was converted inter a poker, and a look in his face as if he thought that this ere round world was a football made on purpose for him to kick at, you may be sure to know, gal, that 'tis all for show, gal. And if that aint rhyme!' sez dad, chuckling and rubbing his hands. 'But lawr!' sez he, stopping and getting downright mad, 'if that ere peacock and her feller aren't a making fun of Sim!'

"There was the feller pinting his cane arter Sim, and laffing; and the gal turned round laffing too—and if she wasn't Sal!

"'Tis Sal!' sez dad. 'No it aint,' then sez he. 'My gal wouldn't make a walking show of herself,—and going with that feller! Look at him! Lawr, he's a slander on human natur!'

"Never mind 'em, dad,' sez I; for it was Sal. And as we were passing, I kind of moved between him and them. Now dad was allers as kewrious as any old woman, and when we were a-going past, he peaked over my shoulder; and the yell he let out when he seed Sal! If it didn't make Andrew Jackson stop right up, and the folks in the street run around the wagon, as if there was some orful work a-going on in it. Afore I could stop him, dad jumped clean out of the wagon on to the sidewalk, and grabbed Sal by the arm.

"Who is that feller?" sez he, pinting at the feller, who kind o' slunk back agin the railing of the Common.

"O, Mr. Cole, don't you know me?" sez he. 'I'm Nathan Standish!'

"You Joshua Standish's son?" sez dad. 'Lawr! you're the feller that came to Bosting and went a-doing wimmik's work, selling yards of ribbon and spools of thread behind a kounter, because you were too lazy to work like a man. And you, you tarnal, conceited, stuck up critter, you had the impudence to laff at your cousin, whose old clothes are too good for you. Git out!' sez he, 'do they starve you here, you yaller-looking skeleton? And now for you,' sez he, a turning to Sal, who looked as if she was ready to drop intew the ground, she was so ashamed of Nathan Standish and the folks, and so afeard of dad. 'Was it for this,' sez he, a taking hold on her gown and holding it out, so as tew git a better view of it; 'was it for this I give you money to spend in Bosting? Lawr! if the colors aint like fire and brimstone; and there's a meaning in that, considering your bringing up you ought tew understand. Git inter the wagon, and sit behind Mirandy.'

"Sal began to cry, but she got in, and dad arter her; and while the men laffed and the little boys hollered, he turned Andrew Jackson's head toward home. And home, sure enough, we went, without even going to Uncle Thaxter's arter Sal's clothes. We hadn't been home more than a week when Sim comes back, and though they went to the singing-school, and used to meet rale often at quilting frolics, and apple bees, they didn't take the smallest kind of notice of each other; though I guess Sal would like to make up if she could. But taint for a gal to make the first advances any more than it is for a soldier to be the first to retreat.

"Things went on this way for all that winter, and somehow Sal, with all her good looks, could not raise another feller. They all kept shy of her. Mother used to keep me at home to help her, and it made dad allers mad when he seed them going off to have a good time, and me a staying behind.

"Come gals,' he'd say, 'taint fair in ye to have Mirandy staying at home allers.'

"Mr. Cole,' ma'am would say, 'never you mind. Mirandy isn't taken any notice on wharver she goes. Nobody knows whether she goes or no.'

"It was more than a month since I seed Sim, and one day I asked Becky if Sim Langford was a making up to any gal yet.'

"Did Sal tell you to ask that?" sez she.

"No, she didn't," sez I.

"Lawr! he's gone off, no one knows where or no one cares!" sez she. 'There's ma'am a calling you.'

"I was glad to get out of the reach of Becky's sharp eyes, for I felt just like crying, and I did cry that night, when no one saw me, to think that Sim went off without caring to say good-by to me. A few nights arter that, the hull on us went to Marthy Standish's wedding. Sal was going to stand up with her.

"Nathan aint a coming," sez Marthy. "He can't git away from Bosting, so Enoch (that was Martha's feller) has got some one else to stand up with him."

"Lawr! who is he?" sez Sal.

"O, some one who likes you jest as well as you like him," sez Marthy, laffing. And then her mother kem up to say that the minister was come and the folks were all a-waiting.

"So we went down stairs, and who should be below to stand up with Sal but Sim Langford. And if he wasn't dressed to kill; and if he didn't look rale splendid.

"Somehow, Marthy was married afore I knew it—I was so taken up a watching Sim. And I never had sich bad feelings in my heart, and never want ter agin, as when I saw Sal all the rest of that night a-hanging on Sim's arm, jest as if he belonged to her; for they made up right off. Lawr! if I didn't feel then how it went agin a gal to have an ugly face! And it is an orful hard thing when a gal is homely to have her be sartin' of it. I never could git over feeling that. I never talked to a feller but I allers felt that he was a thinking how ugly I was.

"Sal has cotched Sim agin," sez ma'am, coming over where dad and I were sitting.

"I don't believe that," sez dad. "That feller's brains are not made of soft soap, Mrs. Cole. He knows that a gal who was ashamed to own him when he wasn't rigged out in his go-to-meetings, don't desearve to be his wife. And she wout be—mark my words for that."

"Lawr!" sez ma'am, "they ought to send ye to Congress." And off she went in a huff; but afore tew minutes she kem a running back, her hull face as red as a beet. "Squire Libbey's sold his farm, and got fifteen thousand dollars for it! And who d'ye think bought it?"

"I haint an idear," sez dad.

"Guess," sez she.

"I haint an idear," again sez dad.

"Sim Langford," sez she; "and he's got ten thousand more in the bank!"

"Fudge!" sez dad; "where could he get so much money?"

"He's had it for months," sez she; "and he never let on about it to any one. When he went tew Bosting last fall, his cousin, a rale rich man, died, and left Sim twenty-five thousand dollars. But what puzzles me is, why the feller didn't at once make a show with it."

"Coz the feller aint the fool you take him to be," sez he. "There's sich a thing as loving a man for his money, Mrs. Cole. And I reckon as how Sim is cute and knows what's what," sez dad.

"Wall, I'm rale glad," sez ma'am, "that Sal made up with him afore he told about the farm."

"Sim went home with Sal that night, and I was the only one of our gals that hadn't a feller going home with her. Next day Sim comes to our house dressed out in a complete new suit, and told ma'am that he was going to give a house-warming, and he would be very much obleeged to her if she would see to all the fixings. Ma'am said to be sure she would, and then Sim asked the gals to go with him to a circus that was exhibiting in the village; and as they worgoing out, he turns round and sez to me:

"Aint you a-coming, Miss Cole?" He allers called me Mirandy afore.

"I can't spare her," sez ma'am.

"And without another word, he goes off with the gals.

"Mirandy Cole," sez I tew myself, when I went up-stairs and stared straight intew the looking-glass, "are you a natural fool to think that Sim Langford ever cared for the owner of that ugly face, with a mouth big enough to swallow him? O dear! O dear!" And I burst out a-crying.

"Every day, three or four times, Sim came to our house, and at last everything was ready for the house-warming. Ma'am said there wasn't a more comfortable house in the hull State.

"Lawr, Sal!" sez ma'am, when Sal came down all dressed out to go, "that ere conceit of yours came a near taking Sim from you."

"She aint got him yet," sez dad.

"Ma'am gin him a look, and jest then the rest of the gals came in in their new dresses.

"Wall," sez ma'am, "I reckon we'd a better be on the start."

"Hurry up, Mirandy," sez dad.

"Me, sir?" sez I; "I aint a-going."

"You aint?" sez he; "maybe you aint!" and swaring right out. "Then I be skinned," sez he, "if one of those ere wimmin stirs a foot out of this house unless you go tew! Go and put on your new fixings."

"I haint any, dad," sez I.

"Mrs. Cole," sez dad, turning round to mother, "if I warn't a church-member, I'd swar!" sez he; "I'd swar all night—I would! I'm so riled up! Never mind, Mirandy, gal; come in your go-to-meetings."

"I didn't want to go, but I darsn't refuse dad, coz when his temper was riz, 'twas no use going contrary to him; so I went up-stairs, and in less than no time came down ready to go.

"When we got tew the house, Sim was at the door tew meet us; and I thought how he had a smile and a welcome word for all but me; and he even took my hand to shake jest for all the world as if it was a stick without any feeling in it. Every bit of the house, from top to cellar, had all new furniture, and we went over it; and though the gals had seen it all afore, they examined it as much as ever. Soon the company began to come, and soon the house was full. And then if Sal didn't put on the airs—set on to do it of course by ma'am. And law! if the hull of the gals warn't furious agin her; and the way the Green gals, the Tappan gals, and a score of others, turned up their noses at her when she wasn't looking! I saw it all. Then there were plays and dances; but I sat by myself in a corner, no one caring to notice me; and come to think of it now, it was purty much my own fault that I was treated so. There were gals there as homely as I was any day who had fellers around 'em all night; but law! I'd a cut off my head afore I'd try as hard as they did to get 'em.

"When it got about nine o'clock they all went intew the dining-room tew supper—for Sim did the thing rale fashionable—and I of course was left without any one to take me in. There I sat all alone, a-hearing them a-carrying on in the next room, until I could stand it no longer. I went up-stairs, put on my things and left that house, detarmining never agin to enter it—even if Sal was its mistress. When I got out, I thought I was smothering, I felt so. I walked as fast as I could until I got out on the road, and then I stopped and turned round. From where I stood I could hear 'em laughing; and I thought 'twas Sim I saw standing by the window, and Sal side of him. That was too much! I threw myself down beside the fence and cried, I don't know how long. I thought my heart was breaking. Law! you may think me silly; but I was only a young gal, without any eddication, or any one to show me how foolish it was to be repining, or wishing for what I never could hope to get; and there I remained crying till the rale passion of my grief had kind of passed away. It was like a stream whose course you'd want tew stop. The waters keep a gathering till at last they burst over their barrier and sweep everything afore 'em. So it was with the grief that had been a-swelling in my heart all night.

"When I got quiet, I rose up and leaned agin the fence. It was a lovely night, and somehow, as I stood there, with the beautiful moonlight a-falling over me, I thought of the night afore Sim went tew Bosting, when we were a-standing together in the moonlight, and he left a blessing upon my cheek. And it was a blessing to me; for I felt better and kinder toward every one whenever I thought of it. All on a sudden something kim atween me and the moonlight. I looked up, and screamed out, for there was a tall man standing side of me. But afore the scream was out of my lips, I knowed Sim; and that minnit he ketched my hands, and sez he:

"'It's me, Mirandy.'

"I snatched my hands away from him afore he knowed I was a-going to, and moved back—jest for all the world as if he wos a sarpint; while all the time I'd ha' gin everything else I knowed or keered for if I could only ha' thrown myself intew his arms and cried on his breast.

"'Mirandy,' sez he, agin, moving a leetle closer to me; 'Mirandy,' sez he.

"And it wasn't the way he ever said it afore, or the light, laughing tone he used to have a talking to Sal. I kind of felt him a saying it, more than I heerd him, and somehow I began crying agin.

"'Where be you a-going?' sez he.

"'Law! if wimmin aren't queer critters! I stopped crying; and though I couldn't keep the trembling out of my voice, I said mighty cold and proud-like:

"'I'm going home, Mr. Langford.'

"'But what made ye be a-crying, Mirandy?' sez he.

"'Because I wanted tew,' sez I. 'And good night; I'm thinking your company will be a looking arter you.'

"'And I hope they'll be as long looking arter me as I was looking arter you, Mirandy,' sez he.

"'And why did you look arter me?' sez I, arter a little while.

"'Because I wanted tew,' sez he, smiling, as he repeated my words; 'and I looked arter you for the same reason that you cried, Mirandy,—I looked arter you because I couldn't help it; and now come back with me.'

"'No, Sim,' sez I, bursting right out crying agin; 'I aint a-going back there.'

"'And why not?' sez he.

"'Coz I aint wanted there,' sez I.

"'And who don't want you there?' sez he.

"'You, Sim Langford!' sez I, all the pride I had been freezing my heart with melting away afore my love for him and the orful thought I was a-going to love him forever.

"'O, what a thundering lie!' sez Sim, a-ketching me in his arms. 'You aint wanted there? You aint wanted in the house I bought on purpose for you, and so you could live near your father, who is the only other one of your family I'd keer to own!" sez he.

"O, Sim!" sez I, 'you aint in earnest, be you though?'

"Aint I?" sez he. 'And there if you aren't a-crying agin.'

"Coz I'm so glad," sez I, 'and so sorry to think I aint good enough for you.'

"You're a thundering sight too good for me," sez he; 'and it was a-knowing it made me love you. And now maybe you'll come back?' sez he.

"You may calculate I didn't refuse to then. We went back to the house, and when we got to the door, says Sim:

"Mirandy, do you remember the night afore I went to Bosting? Wall, I took something from you that night, and as there is a law agin stealing, I have been rale uneasy, and wishing ever since for a chance to return it. Though aint it strange, Mirandy, I never once regretted taking it?"

"A taking what?" sez dad, opening the door, and laffing. 'Mirandy Cole!' sez he, 'aint you ashamed of sich actions? And Mr. Langford, your company are a wondering where you are,' sez he.

'Sim went intew the parlor, and dad gin me a kiss and a hug, saying he knowed all about it, and I had better go up-stairs and get the sign of crying off my face afore I came into the room. I wasn't long up-stairs afore Almiry Tappan came to fix her hair.

"You here, Mirandy," sez she? 'I didn't see you afore to-night. Come and fix my hair; coz you're first-rate at it.'

"Aint you a-coming down?" sez she. 'O, now do, Mirandy. 'Tis oful hard to go intew a room alone, and have 'em all a staring at you.'

"So I went down with her; and who should be standing at the door but Sim and Sal? I didn't dare tew look at him while I was passing, but he stretched out his hand and stopped me; and he sez to Sal:

"Mirandy's a party good girl, aint she?"

"Sal could afford to be generous where I was consarned, so sez she:

"Yes."

"She'll make some one happy one of these days, I guess," sez he.

"Sal laffed, and when I was moving away I heard her saying:

"O, lawr! no, Mr. Langford; we never expect tew see her married."

"You don't? Now aint that tew bad?" sez Sim.

"That night, when we were a-going home, if dad didn't act as if he left his senses behind him; and none of 'em knew the reason but me. I sat on the front seat of the wagon with him, and every minnit he'd be giving me a hug and a kiss; and he'd whistle Yankee Doodle, and gin me a poke in the side, and say, 'Mirandy Cole, aint you ashamed of yourself?' And then he'd laff. And ma'am, sez she:

"Lawr! what's got intew the man?"

"And dad sez, 'Find out, Mrs. Cole. Maybe you'll know in the morning.'

"Next morning at breakfast, sez dad to ma'am, 'Some one asked me last night for one of my gals.'

"You don't say!" sez ma'am, looking so tickled. "Wasn't it Sim Langford?"

"Nobody else," sez dad.

"Lawr, Sal!" said Becky, who was almost bursting with rage and envy, 'you needn't put on sich airs all at once. I wish he only knowed what a wild cat you are.'

"Sal turned up her nose, and sez she, 'Don't you wish you had him?'

"Look here, Sal," sez Martha Ann, 'when you're married, you've got to buy me a breast-pin for that one of mine you lost.'

"Yes, and my sash she stole out of my trunk and carried to Bosting along with her," sez Miss Lavingy.

"And what do you want, Mirandy?" sez Sal, turning round tew me.

"Aint you a-counting the chickens afore they are hatched, Sal?" sez I.

"Good!" sez dad, giving me a slap on the shoulder. Lawr! it was kind of bad in me, but I couldn't a-help saying it.

"Lawr! if she too aint mad coz she couldn't get him!" sez Sal. 'The beauty!'

"Look here, Sal," sez dad, 'don't you call Mirandy names.'

"Beauty aint a name," sez Sal.

"Wall then," sez he, 'with all your beauty and your fine airs you couldn't ketch Sim Langford. What do you say to that?' sez he.

"O lawr!" sez ma'am and the gals, while Sal turned as white as a sheet.

"Mr. Cole," sez ma'am, facing dad, 'didn't you say Sim Langford asked you for Sal?'

"I didn't say Sal," sez dad.

"Lawr!" sez she agin, while the gals stared at each other; 'and who was it then?'

"Find out, Mrs. Cole!" sez dad, getting up and walking out of the room, and then thrusting his head in at the door, and laffing and pinting at me. 'Ask Mirandy,' sez he; 'maybe she can tell ye.—He's a-coming, he's a coming. Mirandy, gal! Here is he,' sez he.

"I saw Sim coming to the house, and ran out to meet him, leaving dad to git out of the trouble as well as he could. But here is Sim himself."

"Please, Mr. Langford," said I, as he cordially welcomed me, "excuse an impertinent question: Why did you marry Mirandy?"

"Because I loved her, to be sure," was the laughing reply.

"But she has never found out why you loved her."

"Haint she though?" said he, still laughing and rubbing his hands; then folding his arms and regarding the little woman with an expression of tenderness pleasing to see, he heartily exclaimed: "Lawr! she was sich a good critter, I couldn't help it."

An imaginary object at that particular moment riveted my attention on the meadow, and through the stillness I heard a familiar sound. It was not the rustle of the oak leaves, as the branch swayed before the window, or the chirp of the robin fitting through the labyrinth; but what it was, in the language of Samuel Lover, "I leave you to guess."

THE OBSTINACY OF WOMAN.

A tailor having amassed a fortune by trade, cut the shop, and removed to the country to live in dignified leisure. His wife was a bit of a shrew, and apt, as all wives, to find out her husband's weak points. One of these was a shame of his former occupation, and she harped upon the jarring string until the poor wretch was nearly beside himself. Her touch-word, "scissors," spoiled his finest bon mots, and embittered his grandest entertainments; it was flame to tow. He stormed and wheedled; the obnoxious instrument was constantly brandished before his eyes. They were walking one day on the bank of a river bounding his grounds: "You observe," said he, "the delta formed by the fork of the river; its beauty decided me to close the contract."

"Very probable, my dear—it reminds one so much of an open pair of scissors."

One push, and she was in the water.

"I will pull you out, if you promise never to say that word again," halloed the still foaming husband.

"Scissors," shrieked she, and down she went.

"Scissors," as she rose again. The third time she came to the surface, too far gone to speak—but as the waters closed over her, she threw up her arms, crossed her forefingers, and disappeared!—Boston Post.

"I live according to right reason," says the Stoic; "I live to seize the pleasures of the passing days," says the Epicurean; "I live to contemplate the unchangeable truth," says the Platonist; and all three live but in a vain squirrel cage round of vanity.

TO MAGGIE.

BY S. M. ACHESON.

I'll not leave thee yet, love, too fondly I prize
The bright, sparkling glance of thy love beaming eyes;
Too fondly, too dearly, I love thee, to part
From the bright one whose image is fixed in my heart.

I'll not leave thee yet, love, too great is the bliss
To press thy warm hand and to feel thy warm kiss;
To sit in the sunshine thy presence has given,
And feel in my soul 'tis a foretaste of heaven.

I'll not leave thee yet, while my arms can enfold
The only loved being they e'er wished to hold;
While thy faith and thy truth are still pledged to me,
O whither, dear maid, should I wander from thee?

I'll not leave thee yet, while the fair moon shines bright
In the high arch of heaven, as she marshals the night;
While the stars sparkle out mid the firmament blue,
So long are my thoughts and affections with you.

I'll not leave thee yet; while the ocean's waves roll,
So long is your image impressed on my soul;
So long as the tide bears the bark to the shore,
So long will I love thee, "Acushla Makore."

Yes, dear as the shrine to the pilgrim band,
Or water to him who lies parched on the sand,
Are the light of thy eyes and soft accents to me—
O, why should I wander, my loved one, from thee?

A MATRIMONIAL ADVERTISEMENT.

BY S. M. WOOD.

"SARAH, who's that?" said I, as a young lady who was passing, looked up to the window and bowed. There was something very attractive about her; not that she was regularly beautiful, but there was an airiness and grace in her little figure, a freshness and archness to her fair bright face, as it was upturned to the window, with its large, dark, laughing eyes, waving hair, and ripe, full lips, that was very charming. "Who is it, Sarah?" I repeated, "she's a perfect little fairy."

"It's Mrs. Robertson," said Sarah, "Nellie Bird, that was, she's the most charming little creature! and by the way, Sue, did I ever tell you about the way she came to be married to Mr. Robertson? It was the oddest thing! so romantic!"

"Delightful! do tell me about it. There's nothing like these romances in real life, and people generally go and get married in such stupid, hum-drum ways. So, Sarah, my dear, suppose you should make yourself agreeable, now, and tell me about it. I'm all attention."

So I poked the fire vigorously to make it look bright and cheerful, folded up my work, settled myself in a most delightfully lazy attitude on the lounge, and in short gave Sarah to understand that I was preparing for what she knows I like better than anything else, one of her long stories.

"Really want to hear it?" said the provoking creature, as though she didn't know that I was waiting for her to begin.

"Of course I do."

"Well, I'll tell you about it."

So she went through divers performances by way of "fixing herself" comfortably, and fidgeted round, putting up her work, setting back the work-table and putting the poker in its place, which I had left on the floor, and was so long getting ready to begin, that my patience was quite exhausted. At last, however, seating herself in the large rocking-chair, she began:

"This was the way of it, Sue. Nellie Bird and I went together in New York to Mrs. Lowell's boarding-school, and we roomed together and Nellie always told me all her secrets, so I knew all about the affair."

"What affair?" said I.

"Why, her marriage, of course! I wish you wouldn't interrupt me, Sue, it puts me all out. Nellie was forever getting into some scrape, but she was such a merry, artless, bewitching little creature, that I took a wonderful fancy to her. One day—you've seen those matrimonial advertisements in the New York Herald, Sue?"

"Yes," I replied, thinking the question very inappropos.

"One day we were sitting in our room, Nellie and I, Nellie reading the Herald, when all at once she broke out with:

"Sarah, lend me a pen and sheet of Bath post, will you? I'm going to answer this 'Matrimonial,' in the paper."

"What do you mean, Nellie," I exclaimed, 'you're not in earnest?'

"To be sure I am, 'twill be such sport. Let me read it to you."

"I am not sure I remember it exactly, Sue, but I believe this was about the way it ran: 'A young man of twenty-five, of good family, moderate fortune and fine education, wishes to enter into a correspondence with a young lady not more than twenty years old, with a view to matrimony. She must be attractive in appearance, amiable, intelligent and refined. Address A. R. CLIFFORD, Philadelphia, Pa.'

"There, Sarah," said Nellie, 'I'm going to answer that, just for the fun of the thing, and see what he'll write back. I shall come near enough to his description of what Mrs. Clifford ought to be, shan't I? I'm only eighteen, and I'm sure I'm attractive in appearance, now ain't I, Sarah?'

"And the little creature put on such a fierce expression, by way of looking attractive, that I laughed in spite of myself. Well, of course, Sue, I said what a proper young lady like myself would be expected to say on such an occasion. I didn't think it would be right, as she wasn't in earnest, but she only laughed at me, and took her own way, as she always did. So she wrote the letter, signed it ELLEN VOGEL (the German for bird, you know), and directed it according to the advertisement."

"I wonder what she said in it?"

"O, she described herself in it, and very wittily too. 'Twasn't more than a week after that, that Nellie danced into the room, all out of breath, holding up a letter in a bold, gentleman's hand. After capering round with it in her hand, teasing me with it, and finally singing what she was pleased to call a 'triumphal chant,' over it, she tossed it into my lap for me to read. It was really a capital letter. He told her that he liked her answer exceedingly, and proposed that they should keep up the correspondence till they could appoint a place of meeting. And so they did, and Mr. Clifford seemed to enjoy it amazingly, and I'm sure Nellie did, 'it's so piquant and funny,' she said.

"After it had gone on in this way about three months, he wrote that he should probably be in New York in about six weeks, and requested her to name a time and place for an interview. In the meantime he was sorry to say their correspondence must be suspended, as he should be absent from Philadelphia, and could not tell her where to direct her letters. Nellie demurred at first, but finally curiosity got the better of her scruples, and she wrote to him to meet her on the thirteenth of the next month (December), on Fifth Avenue, opposite—I forget the place now, Sue, it's so long since I was in New York, but no matter—he was to be at the place she mentioned just as the clock struck three. She would wear a blue silk dress, and throw up her veil (which should be blue), and bow just as the clock struck. He was to wear a narrow blue ribbon in his button hole, and raise his hat, which should be a white one, just as she threw up her veil."

"Very boarding-school-girlish, wasn't it?"

"Yes indeed! I teased Nellie unmercifully about it, but she didn't care a fig. She meant to go the whole figure, she said. The first three weeks of the time she was all impatience for the day to come, but the last three were vacation, and she spent them at her aunt's and saw a great deal of company, so her mind was taken up with other things. I asked her one day if she really meant to meet that Mr. Clifford?"

"To be sure; why shouldn't I? If I don't like him, I shall just tell him so, and there will be an end of it."

"But if you do like him, what then? do you mean to marry him?"

"I really don't believe she had seriously thought of that question before. She colored and didn't answer for a moment, and then turned it off with a toss of her little head."

"Pooh! she shouldn't like him, dare say he was a fright, had red hair likely as not, and she wasn't going to throw herself away on a man with red hair, no indeed!"

"One day, the first part of vacation, she came to Cousin Mary's where I was staying, to see me. She had been to a party the night before, and such a magnificent time as she had, 'and was introduced to such a splendid person; he was all the rage, they said, and the most fascinating man that ever was, Sarah, so handsome and talented, and the most perfect gentleman,' and he had asked permission to call on her next day, 'just think, Sarah! and his name was Mr. Robertson!'"

"And so she ran on, going into such raptures over him, that my curiosity was wrought to the highest pitch to see him."

"I think it was about time for Mr. Robertson to make his appearance," I remarked.

"For the next three weeks," continued Sarah, without noticing my interruption, "I heard of nothing but this Mr. Robertson all the time. Their acquaintance certainly did get on famously. He called on Nellie, I couldn't tell you how many times, lent her books, and took her to ride. I began to think that the matter was getting to be very serious; more than a mere flirtation. One night we both were going to a party where he was to be, and I was in such a state of anxiety to see him, for I felt, though she herself had never breathed it to me, that Nellie's feeling towards him was one far stronger than mere liking."

"Was he really so fascinating?" I asked.

"Yes, I was very much pleased with him. And after observing him narrowly during the evening, I felt sure that he was truly passionately in love with Nellie. And no wonder. She did look so charming that evening, all in white, her dark eyes all full of expression, the most delicate flush on her cheeks, and an unwonted gentleness and thoughtfulness in her air, for which I could readily account, and which gave an additional charm to her face. A beautiful girl is never so beautiful as when truly in love, Susan."

I assented and Sarah went on with her story.

"All this time Nellie seemed to have forgotten about Mr. Clifford, till one day, I reminded her that the next day was the thirteenth, and by way of drawing her out, observed that she must be very glad. She changed color.

"O, what should she do? she had entirely forgotten it, she couldn't bear the thought of meeting that hateful Mr. Clifford, and what would Mr. Robertson think if he knew of her folly? 'Why, Sarah, the other day some one was speaking of a matrimonial advertisement she had seen, before him, and you have no idea how disgusted he looked at the mention of such a thing.'"

"At first she almost determined not to keep the appointment, but afterwards came to the conclusion that she was bound in honor to do so, and that it was only just punishment for her imprudence. If that Mr. Clifford was at all what he seemed in his letters, she should tell him how displeased with herself she was for her insincerity in writing to him, tell him her wish that the affair should end at once, and they should exchange letters and forget that either of them had been so foolish."

"I was amused with her plan, but said nothing, for I knew it would be of no use."

"If I thought there was any chance of my meeting Mr. Robertson at the time I appointed to meet that Clifford," said Nellie, disconsolately, "I should almost die, but I know I shan't, for I heard him tell aunt to-day he had an engagement to-morrow at three, and I think it's so lucky."

"Late in the afternoon of the next day, Nellie came to see me in such a state of excitement."

"O, Sarah," she exclaimed, "it was Mr. Robertson!"

"Who was Mr. Robertson?" said I, all in the dark as to what she meant.

"Why, that Mr. Clifford I went to meet, and that I've been writing to so long. Clifford is his middle name. I was so surprised; and O, Sarah—!" and here she stopped, blushing as red as a peony."

"I suspected it was going to turn out so," I exclaimed, "wasn't it nice? so romantic!"

"Of course you knew how it would come out," said Sarah, looking provoked. "I never told you a story yet, but you always said so, but I haven't finished yet."

"After awhile Miss Nellie made out to tell me, with many blushes and much stammering, that Mr. Robertson had offered himself and she had accepted him; both of which highly interesting events I was of course prepared for, as soon as she told me of Mr. Clifford's metamorphosis into Mr. Robertson. Her account of their meeting amused me very much. She was walking slowly up Fifth Avenue, having nearly reached the place agreed upon, and the clock only wanting just a minute of three, when she saw Mr Robertson coming as slowly down the street. Not another white hat could she see anywhere; and her consternation at seeing him was only equalled by her fear lest she should have to wait for that Mr. Clifford.

"Before she had quite made up her mind to turn back, and give up the interview, for fear Mr. Robertson should see and recognize her, they both met and the clock struck. Just imagine her surprise, her utter amazement, Sue, on seeing the blue ribbon in his button hole! She had just presence of mind enough to throw up her veil and then he saw who it was.

"Sarah," said Nellie to me, 'you never saw such a look of bewilderment in your life, as he gave me at first, and then all at once his face lighted up so. He didn't say one word except "Miss Bird!" as though he was too astonished to say anything more, and then he saw how pale I was—I was trembling all over, Sarah—and felt pale as death, and he gave me his arm, and we walked on a little way without either of us speaking and then—he said—you know the rest, Sarah,' Nellie said, turning her face away from me so that I shouldn't see her blushes. 'And O, Sarah, I'm so glad;' and so, by way of showing how glad, I suppose, she burst out crying."

"I'm sure that was natural enough," said I, "but I don't understand how Mr. Robertson came to put that advertisement in the paper, it was very queer, certainly."

"He put it in for the same reason that Nellie answered it, for the oddity of the thing, and to see what would come of it. He came to New York in hopes of getting some clue as to who his fair correspondent might be, but had been disappointed. As his interest in Nellie increased, so did his vexation with himself for doing anything so foolish, and his desire of getting honorably out of the scrape, but, like Nellie, he saw no other way but to go and have the dreaded interview. They have had many a laugh over it since. Nellie says she is glad that he did one foolish thing in his life, she wouldn't like him to be quite perfect. While he asks her occasionally, if she ever knew a Miss Vogel that carried on a correspondence once with a gentleman she didn't know anything about, even whether his hair wasn't red."

Here Sarah stopped, leaned back in her chair, and looked as if she had an idea of representing the picture of "finis" in old-fashioned books.

"Well, but Sarah," said I, "how about the wedding? who ever heard of a story's ending without an account of the wedding?"

"O, in six months, as soon as Nellie was out of school, I had the honor of standing up with her as bridesmaid, and she did make the prettiest little bride I ever saw. As for Mr. Robertson he looked, as of course bridegrooms are always expected to look, "like an embodied joy." They live in Philadelphia, and seem to be very happy in each other, as I have no doubt they are. The last time I was there, Sue, Nellie showed me among her treasures, a narrow piece of blue ribbon and a blue veil, which she said she wouldn't lose for anything."

And Sarah got up and went to bring in the lamps, leaving me to indulge in delicious reveries in the twilight.

VIEW OF TEMPERANCE.

"Intemperance," said Mrs. Partington, solemnly, with a rich emotion in her tone, like an after dinner speech, at the same time bringing her hand, containing the snuff she had just brought from the box, down upon her knee, while Lion with a violent sneeze, walked away to another part of the room; "Intemperance is a monster with a good many heads and creeps into the bosoms of families like any conda or an allegator, and destroys its peace and happiness forever. But, thank Heaven! a new Erie has dawned upon the world, and soon the hydrant headed monster will be overturned. Isn't it strange that men will put enemies into their mouths to steal away their heads?" "Don't you regard taking snuff a vice?" we asked, innocently. "If it is," she replied with the same old argument, "it is so small a one that Providence won't take no notice of it, and besides, my oil factories would miss it so!" Ah, kind old heart, the drunkard's argument! and he who casts stones at his frail brother must first see if there be not something at home to correct before he presumes upon his own infallibility. Like all the while was watching Lion, as he lay growling in his sleep, and wondering if he was dreaming about him.—Evening Gazette.

NONSENSE FOR NONSENSE.

Suvaroff, the half-mad, half-savage Russian general, used frequently to ask the young officers and soldiers the most absurd questions, considering it a proof of smartness on their part if they gave a prompt reply, and hating above all things "I don't know" as an answer. He one day went up to a sentry, and, as the man presented arms, Suvaroff said, "Tell me how many buttons there are on the uniforms of fifty thousand men?" "I can't say," replied the soldier, very naturally; upon which the marshal, according to his custom, began to abuse him and rate him for his stupidity. The soldier, however, knowing Suvaroff's character, took courage, and said, "Well, sir, perhaps it's not every question your excellency could answer yourself; for instance, there are my two aunts—would you please to tell me their names?" The man's quickness atoned for his impudence in the eyes of the general, and the soldier was made a corporal the next morning.—Records of the War.

A FOURTH OF JULY FAILURE.

BY FRANCIS P. PEPPERELL.

It once chanced to be my miserable fortune to be in a lively, half-country, half-city town on one of those luckless anniversaries of rowdies' freedom to act as they please and everybody's else bondage in discomfort. At precisely twelve at night, six meeting-house bells sent out a terrific peal by means of six ragged little boys who, for the sum of "nimepumpse," dangled at the bell-ropes, frightened to death, till that moment when all other people. After one or two faint cries of "Fire!" by certain barbarous Benedict Arnolds, they might scare the ghosts, as I am sure they did who had forgotten the approaching date, the ringing gave over just to allow one time to drop off and be suddenly pulled up by another tug at the bell-rope, which I have no doubt was many times wished to be round the ringers' throats, instead of the bells.

At last grown accustomed to the bells, with my head securely wrapped in impenetrable folds, I had entered Elysian realms, where Horatio Augustus Miffin, the slender swain with light hair and no eyes in particular, was gracefully kneeling in nankeens and pledging eternal faith to his pocket-handkerchief, though he meant it for me, when a great cannon, with a noise like thunder, threw its wad into my chamber through the open window. Thinking perhaps the Turks had come, or the Millerites had made a mistake in their calculations, I got up and dressed myself. This act being accomplished in a state of profound silence meanwhile, suddenly, as if in honor of the event, not one, but twenty simultaneous cannon went off as though they never intended to come back; but return they did, with redoubled vigor.

I took an arm-chair by the window, and soon, by a flash from another powder-mill explosion, perceived it was exactly ten minutes past twelve. The bells had rung, I had had five or six naps, Horatio had almost proposed, the cannon been fired, my toilet completed, the Fourth inaugurated, and all in ten minutes.

After endeavoring to be patriotic, by putting my head out of the window and hallooing "hurrah!" I put it in again and endeavored to be vigilant for the nation's welfare by picking my eyes open and trying to hold them so. But I think I scarcely succeeded, for I have faint ideas of dreaming about falling into Horatio's arms at the end of his declaration (which he probably resumed) when I was conscious of Horatio's becoming a variety of objects at once: now a glass of foaming beer, which I was eagerly trying to drink, now a fine sputtering and broiling egg, then, with a thousand blushes, metamorphosing himself into any innumerable quantity of bad fire-crackers, with which I burned my fingers to blisters; and finally, through a raw, dull twilight, in a half-drizzling rain, two young men under my window, with muskets that fixed and hissed alternately, without any violent noise in the damp air; this was a Fourth of July serenade.

As burnt powder was not too delightful a scent, I opened the door, and from among a number of boots set out for the morning operations in Day & Martin, at Mr. Smith's Vulture Hotel, selected the heaviest pair, and stealing back to my window, threw them with all my force at the heroic serenaders, one of whom happened to be the veritable Horatio Augustus Miffin. I followed up this charge of foot-soldiery by the contents of my water-pitcher. At this, the young gentlemen, after a short consultation, thinking they had found the wrong window, withdrew to one some yards distant, occupied by a testy old bachelor. In a very short time I heard the possessor of single-blessedness blundering around, and saw the dodging young gentlemen withdraw to another, where I presume they met with equal success in archery, for after one or two more efforts, they went off dispiritedly, to return their fowling pieces, which had met nothing but foul play.

By this time, the rising sun had dispelled rain and sleep, and ushered in the Calathumpians—a band of male individuals dressed as absurdly as possible and designed to bring together ridiculous scenes which only succeeded in being ridiculous failures; I noticed a great many young men endeavoring to represent his satanic majesty, by means of hoops, tails and horns of black leather, who would have been much better representations probably, entirely undisguised. After this the dressing bells, and breakfast bells rang, and all the meeting-house bells as well, and all the cannons and muskets popped prodigiously, and breakfast was ready.

Breakfast consisted mostly of a clean tablecloth (in honor of the day), and some of the water with which the dinner dishes had been washed yesterday, warmed up, sweetened, and called coffee. After this a variety of floral processions, where patient young ladies displayed their broiling beauty, and sons of temperance, walking savagely straight, took place; and then I concluded to visit a fair. Dear male reader, do not fancy I was contemplating an invasion of your monopoly of visiting—no fair young scraphess with languishing ringlets was my fair; but a place where quarrels are given away, and whited-sepulchral impostures, in the shape of pincushions and embroidery, are vend- ed; so tying on my bonnet, I went out. After running a gauntlet of saucy little boys with matches and fire-crackers, and escaping miracu- lously unhurt though I twice lost my slippers and had to go back for them, I reached the hall door. The Babel within was deafening, the shrill voices of females in division and derision rising like clarions above the tumult. Neverthe- less I was assured that as the noise is in propor- tion to the good will and merriment, there would have been considerably more clamor if the ladies of the parish had not fallen out about whether the price of admission should be a dime or ten cents. The first object that struck my eye on entering, was Mr. Miffin ogling a young damsel behind a stall, and sucking his cane in the intervals. I must say I was rejoiced when he went off, the purchaser of a smoking cap that dropped its tassel on the floor and ripped off its embroidery on the button of his coat pocket as he thrust it therein; and was equally so, when the minx, who had extort- ed the sacrifice from Horatio, let fall the pieces of silver on the floor. Part of them she recovered, but I saw one young Autolycus pocket the bal- ance, and spend it at a soda fountain, and I on- ly wish he had got the rest.

Meantime Horatio was negotiating for a pin- ball stuffed with Indian meal, as I was led to in- fer from the fact, that having placed it in his hat, his head soon presented the appearance of a fat leg of veal dredged with flour and ready for bak- ing (indeed malicious gossips were always in the habit of declaring Horatio was only half-baked). I now devoted myself to a limited course of gas- tronomy, and was there again finished by behold- ing Horatio in the clutches of a female raven who gorged both him and herself in a way frightful to behold. I now bought a doll for a juvenile ac- quaintance, and was not at all surprised to see her a few moments afterwards, dangling by one disjointed arm, a small heap of rags, and leaving a track of bran behind her as she walked. Just as I was leaving I obtained one last glimpse of Horatio, who seemed distracted to spend his money, and having paid two bits for a turn at the grab-bag, had fished up a Gibraltar, with which last expression of despair he disappeared. On my way home I was twice knocked down (in one of which evolutions, somebody's kind feel- ings prompted them to relieve me of the load of my purse), once run over, three times addressed with a "stop thief!" and had four spaces ex- tracted from my shawl.

Sitting down by a window to read in the lull of the noise, I was awakened from the sorrows of Werther, by those more tangible, feeling rather warm; in fact, a roguish boarder underneath, had fixed a lighted bunch of crackers to a broom- stick and thrust them up to my window till my dress had caught, and I had a prospect of flames far more ardent than those of Horatio. Throw- ing myself on a Turkey rug, I succeeded in suc- coring myself; but a bath, a fresh toilet and a new frock was necessary. Before I was en- tirely ready, the bells rung for dinner, whose chief entertainment was announced to be young lamb, green peas, strawberries and ice-cream. The vegetable dishes, when I reached the table, were slightly colored, but there was nothing in them.

I was indeed helped to young lamb, but unless judging from the vertebrae, I should be unable to declare it fish or flesh, since there was so little on the bone. Strawberries looked much more like lightning than themselves, and ice- creams were decidedly milky enough to be placed among the constellations in the galaxy. The dessert was further enlivened by a cart passing, full of men who had been killed and maimed at the cannon during the morning. After this ap- parition of dinner, as all nature seemed to be tak- ing a nap, except of course, the little fire-cracker gnomes, I would have followed their example, but was forestalled by loud murmurs growing nearer and nearer till they finally developed into a row, a successor of the morning's entertain- ment at the fair; Yankees Germans, Irish, Scotch, "Eye-magis" and Indians, all uniting their exertions. This, resulting in the police and some talk, at last gave way to dark and fireworks, which did the usual amount of damage, and the Fourth of July was over. I believe I make a mistake though, when I say so, for the grandest fire-work came off a few hours later, when as every one was audibly snoring their "Horatio," the house was found to be on fire, and continued so, though the inmates, if I remember rightly, escaped with life and the property of a few barns.

Since this Fourth of July, I have regularly made a practice of going, three weeks before the day, among North American savages, or to the most distant corners of the earth, to avoid patri- otic celebrations, rows, fairs, fire-works and civilization.

There is something inexpressibly sweet about little girls. Lovely, pure, innocent, ingenuous, unsuspecting, full of kindness to brothers, babies and everything. They are sweet little human flowers, diamond dew-drops in the breath of morn.

THE HOMESICK CHILD.

BY MRS. B. T. ELDRIDGE.

O, take me hence: the flowers that blossom here
Are not so fair as those my mother loved;
No other spot can ever seem so dear,
And when I turn my longing eyes above,
E'en the fair blue sky seems not so bright and clear.

O, take me home!

O, take me home! the dew gems on the flowers
All look like little tear-drops, trembling there;
I yearn to see my own dear, favorite bowers,
Where opening flower buds scent the morning air
Where wild birds sing through the bright summer hours.

O, take me home!

O, take me home! where my dear mother's sleeping,
In the old churchyard 'neath the willow-tree;
A cold sensation through my heart is creeping,
O, how I wish my spirit could be free.
My heart is sick, and I'm tired of weeping,

O, take me home!

O, take me home! where my sweet mother died;
I feel I know I shall be happier there;
She'll linger near me when my heart is tried,
The flowers she loved will seem more bright and fair;
My heart will break—I must not be denied—

O, take me home!

KATY DARLING.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

"WELL, Katy, the cold word must be spoken, and maybe it's better now, than waitin' till the mornin' and only givin' fresh sorrow to our hearts. I'll say good-night and good-by; and may all the guardians of the innocent protect my Katy, till I return and claim her for my own true wife. God bless you, Katy! God keep and watch over ye!"

And as he spoke, Dermot O'Neil took the half-fainting girl in his arms, and pressed her gently again and again to his heart.

"It may be long years will rowl over both our heads, before the time arrives when I return, with joy in my heart, and gold in my pocket, to wed the girl I've pledged my troth to; but, Katy, dear, be sure of one thing, my love for you can never change, or grow cold; and while that bright, winkin' star above our heads looks down upon the earth as it does now, so long will Dermot O'Neil be true to the girl of his heart. Kiss me once again, darling, and then unloose your own dear arms from about my neck, while my manhood holds its strength, and before I become little better than a child."

Summoning all her fortitude, she released him, and stood erect by his side, only continuing to rest one hand upon his shoulder, as she gazed up into his honest face.

"Go, Dermot, dear, go! You say true, it is better that we part now. You've a stout heart and a ready hand, and with these in the new land where you're goin', thousands have succeeded before, and why not you? Go, thin, Dermot, and remember there's a fond prayer from a lovin' heart goin' up to Heaven for you every night you are away; and while I sit in solitude and silence, and watch that same bright star, be sure I'm thinkin' of you, and of the last time we gazed on it together and pledged again the vows never to be broken only by death."

"That's my own Katy; you give me new strength seein' the hope that's bearin' you up in this way. Partin's not quite so hard now. There, once more good-by, and once more, God in Heaven keep you till I clasp you again within these arms!"

And so parted the lovers, he to toil in a strange land for the bread he could not earn upon the soil of his birth, and she to count the days and hours when once more his footsteps should be heard, and the sound of his voice send a thrill of joy to her now so sadly desolate heart, more desolate still from the fact of her being both fatherless and motherless, living among strangers, and dependent almost upon the hand of charity for the shelter of a roof.

James Carrol, a young man filling the situation of lodge-keeper or porter on the estate of a gentleman whose mansion overlooked the village of Dunmeary, was at one time one of Kate Clennon's most assiduous suitors, but as the affection existing between her and Dermot O'Neil manifested itself, he appeared gradually to withdraw his pretensions, and now treated her no more than as a friend, appearing to be satisfied that she never could, towards himself, show any other feeling than that of friendship. She saw him but rarely, and then it was but to exchange a passing remark and each pursue their own way.

The days and hours flew by, and now nearly two years had elapsed since the departure of Dermot O'Neil for a foreign land. His betrothed heard from him with the greatest regularity, and his letters breathed everything of increasing fondness and remembrance. He was doing well, he wrote, and had even begun to turn his thoughts towards returning to the land of his birth, and upon his re-embarkation taking her back with him to his pleasant home in the new world. It was James Carrol that brought these letters over with him from the post-office in the market town, and considering that he was himself a disappointed wooer, she thought this very kind and considerate of him, and proceeding from the most disinterested of motives.

After these letters had been received with the greatest punctuality for all this length of time, they now, strange to say, began to arrive somewhat more tardily. The delay between each became more lengthy still, and finally, to her terror, they ceased altogether. She would sit as she had been used to do, and watch at the cottage window for the sound of James Carrol's cart rattling along the road, and then, upon its appearance, unable to control her anxiety, would rush out and demand of him whether he yet brought the long-wished-for letter. The usual reply, accompanied by a sorrowful shake of the head :

"No, Katy, there's no letter this time for ye; but never mind, there'll be one to-morrow without fail. Keep up your heart, Katy—keep up your heart!"

She was seated in the same, green spot where she had parted from him now two years ago, and as she sat there she thought of that interview, and of the holy promise he had made to her, that while the star she gazed on should shed its light upon the earth, so long would he be the same true and faithful lover to her that he ever had been. She would believe him—she could not make her mind up to do otherwise. He might be ill—dying!—who knew what might be the matter? But untrue to her after that solemn assurance? never! A step by her side startled her from her meditations, and looking up she beheld the figure of James Carrol.

"Good evening, Kate, a kind good evening." She thought his voice trembled as he spoke.

"I did not see you pass by the cottage to-day, James. I suppose you had not time to go up to town to-day?"

He hesitated a moment before replying.

"Yes, I did go, but—"

"O, don't say the word that I dread to hear. Another day and still no word."

"I don't know, Katy, dear, what to say;" he took her hand gently as he spoke; "I wint, an—an I did get a letter!"

"O, give it to me—don't keep me a moment longer in suspense! I'll die if you keep it from me, James Carrol!"

Still he hesitated, as though he had some information to impart, but scarcely knew how to break it to her.

"Why do you hesitate, James Carrol? Sure it's cruel to torture me in this way. Be the news what it may, I can bear it better than this delay."

"The letter, Katy, is from Dermot O'Neil, but it is not directed to you."

"Not to me! why, how—what do you mean? O, I know, it's ill he is, an' he thought to break it more gently to me by sendin' to another first, an' tellin' him to break it to me by gentle degrees. Dear Dermot, he would not give me one pain that he could avoid."

"No, Katy, it's not that—"

"Then speak, James Carrol!" said she, starting up vehemently; "tell me at once all you have to say, or you'll see me mad before you. My heart and my brain have been already taxed beyond their strength. Be it what it may that ye have to tell me, I must hear it now!"

"Katy, the man you place so much confidence in, is not worthy of your love. He is no longer true to you."

"How dare you say that to me? You stand before me with your pretended honesty, and tell me what you know to be false as your own evil heart! It is useless. I'll not believe Dermot O'Neil to be untruthful, any more than I'll doubt that grass grows or water runs!"

"But av I show you the proofs, Kate Clennon, of what I've tould you, you must believe. I know it's hard, and why Dermot gave it into my hands to break the news to you, I know not. But av you know his handwriting, just look at that letter, and you'll maybe own that you've done me wrong."

As he spoke he handed her from his breast a letter directed to himself, and in the handwriting that she knew so well. The beams of the moon gave just enough light to allow of its being read, but she essayed in vain to make anything of the characters; for there was a swimming within the brain, and an indistinct mist before her eyes, that rendered it impossible for her to read. In a husky voice she murmured forth:

"Tell me what it is he says there; read me the letter, and as you hope for peace on earth and rest in heaven, don't deceive me in a line."

"He says here, that he could not summon the courage to break to you the news that he felt he ought to tell; but that he hopes I'll do him the friendly service, and as well as I know how to inform you of all, and break to you the news as gently as I can. When I should get the letter he would be already—calm yourself, Katy—already tied to another, a young woman, the daughter of the man in whose employment he is, and right well to do in the world. He hopes you'll soon forget him, and take from those left at home a husband who will thrait you kindly, and in whose arms you'll forget him; and that he'll ever think kindly of you as long as he lives. And so he finishes."

He looked down towards her as he finished reading, and wondered that she sat there so calm and motionless. The light of the full moon fell down upon her face, and he saw that it was quite white and death-like, and that her eyes were staring straight out before her, fixed upon vacancy. He felt alarmed and touched her upon the arm.

"Katy! Katy!"

Still she moved not, nor looked towards him.

"Katy! Why don't you answer? Shall I take you home?"

She slowly lifted her eyes towards the stars, and fixing her gaze upon one, pointed with her finger towards it.

"Look, it's there to-night as it always is, it's waiting with me for Dermot's return. "O, it's the beautiful little star, and smiles and winks at me as I look up at it in the still and quiet of the night, as much as to say, 'wait only a little longer, he'll be here soon, and keep the oath that he took upon that night, when he called upon me to bear witness to his words, keep waitin' patiently, Katy, but a little while longer!'"

James Carrol lifted her face towards his own, and as he caught the full gaze of her eye, he saw that the heavily taxed brain had at length lost its power, and that sweet "Katy Darling" was a smiling, harmlessly gentle idiot, idly plucking the wild-flowers and the grass at her feet, and tossing them listlessly away to be borne off upon the soft breath of the summer's breeze.

Close by the outskirts of the village ran a rapid stream, beside whose banks, many a time had the former lovers wandered hand in hand, or seating themselves beside it, planned bright pictures for the future in store for them. Scarcely a week had passed, when some of the villagers discovered, lying upon its banks, the well known hood and scarf that Katy Darling was always seen to wear. Nothing had been seen of her for some hours, and the sad conclusion presented itself to all, that poor Katy had either by accident or intention precipitated herself into the stream.

They noticed, too, that the brow of James Carrol had become lined and his cheeks hollow and thin, and though he had never before been much of a favorite with the people of the country round, yet now, as they saw him pass slowly by and saw these traces of feeling upon his countenance they looked one towards the other, and said in low tones, "poor fellow, he takes it much to heart. James Carrol was a better man than we ever gave him credit for."

The dead body of a woman was found soon after, floating in the river at the distance of some miles from the village of Dunmeary, and after an inquest at the spot where it was picked up, it was claimed by the inhabitants of the village and by them decently interred.

The kind-hearted neighbors, not content with merely providing it with a resting place, put together their small means and over the mound of grass-grown earth raised a little white stone bearing the simple inscription of "KATY DARLING;" and as the stranger passing by inquired the history of it, they told him the affecting tale, and it rarely happened that both narrator and listener had not tears in their eyes ere it was concluded. One evening a stranger alighted at the village tavern, and leaving his horse to the care of the hostler, took a stroll in the direction of the little grave-yard wherein stood the grave of poor Kate Clennon. As he walked slowly along, he began speaking low to himself and the subject of his communings was somewhat in this wise:

"I could not help coming once again to visit the old spot, though it is painful to look upon the scenes of once happy hours. Had she but remained constant, how different might it have been."

He had by this time reached the little grave-yard, and undoing the simple wicket-gate, he entered and began glancing over the inscriptions. He paused before several, and as he read them, murmured forth:

"What! another gone? Well, well, we shall all lay thus one day, and what matter that one is gone a little while before the other?"

The new white stone next caught his eye, and he glanced toward it. As though a bullet had been suddenly fired from an unseen quarter and had struck him to the heart, he could not have received a greater shock.

"She dead! she dead!"

This was all that his trembling lips could utter, and he repeated the words again and again. A footstep by his side startled him not, and it was not until a voice addressed him that he turned and found a lad standing by him.

"You'll maybe be luckin' at the ground that covers Katy Darling, sir?"

"Yes—can you tell me anything of her death? Speak!"

The boy at once entered into the story of the unfortunate girl's death, and as he proceeded, could not but perceive the palor that overspread the stranger's face, nor the trembling that had seized his limbs as he told him all he knew.

"And so, sir, she was buried there as you see, and all of us as we go by her grave drop an Ave Maria to the rest of her poor soul. But you're ill, sir—will I see you to the tavern?"

"No, no; go—leave me. I would be alone—alone with the dead. There, go."

And placing a piece of money in the boy's hand, he was soon left to himself.

"And so you're dead, Katy, and 'twas I that killed you! I, that would have given my life—

O, how willingly!—to save yours, darling! But"—and as he spoke his teeth were set hard together—"the earth shall not hide that viper from me! If James Carrol is above ground, he shall feel my vengeance! O, Katy! Katy!"

And the tears gushed forth from his eyes, and fell on the sod beside which he now was kneeling.

"To think that I should have been such a vile fool as to believe the words that that scoundrel wrote to me—that I should have ever dared to doubt the truth of her who was truth itself! O, Katy! Katy!"

And he fell upon the turf and buried his face in the rich grass that flourished upon its surface. A gentle voice aroused him.

"Who is it that calls upon the name of Katy? See, she is here. Who are you that asks for her?"

He looked up in fearful agitation, for the voice was a well-remembered one—O, how well-remembered!

A female figure stood by his side, gazing vacantly upon his face. Her hair hung in dishevelled masses upon her scarce covered bosom, and her feet were shoeless and bleeding. The face was fearfully emaciated and pale as the snow upon the mountain's top. Was this some dream of his excited imagination? or was there really truth in the old superstition of spirits revisiting the scenes of their earthly sojourn? This face was that of—he could not be mistaken—that of Kate Clennon!

"I am tired of waiting for his return. From my cave upon the mountain, I look out at night and see the star that's watching with me. But it seems to be growing weary too, and its light is ever becoming still paler as I look towards it."

Hesprang to his feet and seized her in his arms.

"Katy! Katy! O, what is this? Don't you know me? 'Tis I—Dermot O'Neil—that thus clasps you in his arms! Speak to me—let me once more hear your voice! O, what fearful mystery is hidden here?"

She looked at him still listlessly, while he went on rapidly.

"I never was untrue to you, Katy, but I have kept my oath, and it is you, my darling, that are the victim of a vile deception from one you took to be a friend. Don't you know me yet? Don't you know your Dermot?"

He paused, and gazed with fearful earnestness into her face. Was he right? Yes—there was a ray of intellect beaming forth from her eyes.

"Look, Katy. There above is the same star that looked down upon us on that night when we parted. See! it is shining brighter than ever! It knows full well that I am here the same as when I left you. It's smiling upon me now, and sure the star could not do that and me telling you a black lie before it."

The ray of intelligence grew brighter, Her eye expanded, her cheek glowed as she listened.

"James Carrol told you all that a villain could conceive, and I heard it all to-night for the first time from the lips of a village boy. He wrote letters to me purporting to come from you, and to you he read one that he said was from my hand. Katy, he lied! And only let me see you look into my face with one of your own old glances, and if the wretch is to be found, he shall suffer the fate he so richly deserves. Don't you know me yet, Katy Darling? Don't you hear my voice? and doesn't it remind you of the happy times of old?"

The bright ray of soul had grown still brighter, and as he ended, her white lips parted to murmur forth in natural tones the well-remembered name of "Dermot!" as she sank into his arms and gave full vent to a flood of gushing tears.

He bore her tenderly forth, and in a very short time she was in the hands of those who would watch over her with tenderest care; and in the meantime the news had flown like wild-fire through the country-side that Katy Darling was not dead; or drowned, and that Dermot O'Neil was not the black-hearted villain that they had for so long a time supposed him.

And James Carrol? A few fearful sentences tell the remainder of his history. A band of resolute-looking men had collected together and formed the determination of securing him before the opportunity should present itself of his escape. Their fiercely-knit brows and compressed lips augured but little for their moderation should he show the least resistance. But their labor was in vain, and they were spared, perhaps, the crime which might have hung upon their consciences. Arrived at his house, he was not to be found; and a strict search ended in the discovery of his body suspended from the limb of a tree hard by his dwelling. The news had reached him somehow, and driven to despair, he had committed suicide by hanging himself.

From such fearful thoughts we turn away in horror, and seek once more the gentle Katy's side.

Did he not watch over her with the loving kindness of a mother? And was it not in his arms that the tender and bruised flower found a resting-place, after all the storms that had swept so fiercely over it? It is blooming once again as fresh as ever, and around the parent stem a cluster of little gentle buds are putting forth the first delicate hues of their young presence, one by one, and adding still further joys to the overflowing cup of their parent flower.

THE POWER OF WEALTH.

BY EDGAR R. TALBOT.

Sweet Nelly was a merry sprite,
A blithesome, happy creature;
Her laughing eye was full of light,
And joy lit every feature.

Her hair was of an auburn hue,
Though many called it red;
She wore it twined in graceful braids,
Around her pretty head.

Her rosy cheeks were full and fair,
Where dimples loved to dwell;
Her step was light and free as air—
Such was our laughing Nell.

Alas, for Nelly, she was poor!
Though many called her fair,
They sued not for her pretty hand,
Because she had red hair!

Dame Fortune smiled on her one day—
Her purse, which had been empty,
Was filled with bright and shining coin,
Which brought her beaux in plenty.

That fancied whim about her hair,
Now vanished like the dew;
Tone of the softest, fairest brown,
Just tinged with auburn hue.

Her lovers knelt and sued in vain;
She frowned, and they grew bolder;
Sly, roguish Nell smiled at their pain,
Her looks grew sterner, colder.

"What power wealth has," exclaimed fair Nell;
"Twill even shield a frown;
'Twill make the face look doubly fair,
And change red hair to brown."

When Nelly breathed these cruel words,
Such in a passion started;
They all are fortune-hunters now—
Not one died broken-hearted.

THE VILLAGE ATTORNEY.

BY JOHN THORNBERRY.

SAUTTING himself up in his office, and waiting patiently and alone for customers to come in, Mr. Mark Holden thought to be a very wretched way of earning his bread and butter, and hardly less wretched a means of liquidating the relentless bills of his honest but needy washerwoman. He had read his books pretty thoroughly on that day, and tried in a measure to fortify himself against the insidious assaults of impatience and peevishness. One foot was up against the table, and the other rested on a vacant chair. His eyes ran over the handful of books that comprised his library, while within his heart some dissonant being seemed to ask him if he believed he should ever have much, if any, need of them. Among nearly all the probabilities and possibilities of the future he had sought to explore, if by some means a new hope might turn up somewhere in the rubbish of his plodding life, and brighter days might be found approaching.

As yet, his business had amounted to little or nothing since he opened his office door in the village; and he began seriously to ask himself if it was possible, by remaining longer, to attract that to him which in reality did not exist. A quieter people no young lawyer could have settled amongst—sedulously employed about their own business, and, even if engaged in interference with others, taking care to transgress no statutes in a way to become related to indictable offences. They were outwardly too peaceable to furnish a limb of the law with the salt for his porridge. Not that they were not fond enough of attending court in the innocent capacity of spectators—but they were a thousand times averse to being called in as litigating parties.

The morning was pleasant and fresh, and the sun shone out bright and clear. Coming down the grassy street was a female of middle age, dressed with exceeding plainness and care, who bent her course in the direction of Mr. Mark Holden's little law office. She climbed the stoop before the door, and threw across the office floor a shadow that startled our legal friend from his dumpy dreams in a moment. He took down his feet and sat bolt upright in his chair.

The woman offered him a hasty but somewhat timid salutation, and immediately took the seat he politely handed her. Each sat silent for a few moments, apparently anxious that the other should begin.

"I've come to engage you," finally observed the visitor, impatient of this delay; "I have some business that I wish you would do for me—and 'tisn't for me, either, but for a person that I'm particularly interested in." And here she paused to collect her thoughts previous to setting out on her statement.

"What is the character of the business?" inquired the lawyer, eager to get at the heart of this godsend.

The woman still hesitated.

"My niece, Miss Mary Pease, wishes to bring an action for a breach of promise of marriage," finally answered she.

"Against whom, then?" he inquired, his eyes betraying his astonishment.

"Mr. John P. Martin, of ———," said she, naming a particular city not a hundred miles away.

The attorney was still more astonished. He knew Mr. John P. Martin, and knew him to be a wealthy young man, who had already passed some idle time in that particular neighborhood, and of whom report began to predicate several sorts of stories in connection with Miss Mary Pease. And to learn that this was the nephew of them all!—well might another person than Mark Holden, Esq., have been astonished.

But in view of the nature of the business and his professional connection with the same, Mr. Holden proceeded to put away wonder, and to solicit from his visitor a plain and candid narration of the whole affair. She thereupon began her story, and he sat and listened with an interest and a sympathy that was, on the whole, quite extra-professional.

"I will undertake this suit for her," said he at length, rising from his chair. "There is good ground for it, and I believe it is possible to recover large damages. I will engage to do the best I can for her, madam."

"She could ask no more," replied his visitor. And shortly after, she left the young attorney to himself.

This, for Mr. Mark Holden, was going to be no ordinary case. It came to a man whose ambition was high, and whose business energies were yet to make themselves understood before the world. Heretofore his clients had been few indeed—you could count them on your fingers. But as soon as these things changed, it was not going to be so easy to tell what sort of a man he would be likely to make.

To the study and preparation of this important case, therefore, Mr. Mark Holden addressed himself with all imaginable assiduity. He held frequent and protracted conferences with Mary Pease, coming in a short time to form a close acquaintance with her, and persuading himself that she was a girl of downright solid qualities. It is a fact that the deeper he got in his lawsuit, the more he was ensnared with its fair projector.

Mary Pease was a poor girl, but not the less to be considered for that, though; and if any one in all the village was entitled to the palm for simple, fresh beauty, it would be hard to tell who could fairly bear it away before her. In an unguarded hour, she had yielded her rich affections to this dashing young stranger, believing that he loved her in return; but it was a frail reed on which her hope had leaned, and she discovered it when it was too late. She was deceived, and most cruelly. Her heart was wrung with grief and mortification. It was an instance of confidence such as passes before the notice of the world every day.

It was not from any desire of her own that she brought this suit, but only at the instance and after the repeated urging of her aunt, whose indignation would not permit her to let the matter rest until some proper steps had been taken to testify to her awakened feelings. That Mary had been cruelly wronged, they both believed. They felt the sting of the recollection every day. When they passed the neighbors and looked them full in the face, it was with a dark suspicion, flitting like a bird of ill omen across their minds, that the terrible story was known to them all, and that they were ready to make a mock and a derision of it at every opportunity. This was anything but happiness. It was anything but comfort, or ease, or quiet for their feelings. To go about branded like felons, was more than true female hearts were willing to submit to.

After a most industrious and protracted preparation, the case at length came on for trial. The court was held in a distant town, where already a gathering had signalized the approach of that and other related events. Mary was there with her aunt; but Mr. Martin was thoughtful enough to stay away. His counsel took care of him, and with that he was fully satisfied.

Mr. Mark Holden introduced his case to the attention of the court and jury with a deliberateness of statement, and a clearness of narration, that appealed instantly to the feelings of all. Nor indeed did the spectators seem less interested, either. All voices were hushed into silence, as he laid before the court the matter that he stood up there to represent. First, the great injury done his client; secondly, the enormous wrong of which the unprincipled defendant had been guilty. And he wound up his statement by asking that, after listening to his testimony, the jury should consent to award his injured client such damages as should be exemplary in the minds of the community.

The testimony was offered, piece by piece. On the other side, it was adroitly met by such rebutting circumstances, colored to suit the special purpose in hand, as could be gathered together for the occasion. The defence had little enough to offer, every one could see; and the most was made of the whole of it. It amounted to nothing more than a slurring over of what the prosecution had already established, and a persistent endeavor to slight and render it ridiculous. The spectators were convinced that the lady's was the strong case, and made up their verdict for her long before the jury had thought of such a thing.

Young lawyers are not apt to slight good opportunities to bring themselves out, and Mr. Mark Holden did not. When he arose to address the jury, after the evidence was all in, it was with the weight of a great responsibility upon his heart. Yet he was perfectly self-possessed and calm.

He began by calling attention to the statement he had originally made, and by averring his determination to convince the jury, on a review of the testimony just offered, that his pledge to make his case a good one in their eyes had been amply redeemed. Next he descanted with minuteness and rigor on the several parts of the evidence, commenting freely and at all times with a great deal of feeling. Then he branched out into an expression of such sentiments as moved the hearts of every one who listened, and as he said, belonged peculiarly to his own.

Rising gradually with his theme, and warming with the manly emotions that endeavored to find expression at the door of his lips, he struck off in a strain of true and unaffected eloquence, that both surprised and delighted the whole auditory. Not an eye but was fixed on him—not an ear that did not drink in eagerly his glowing words—not a heart that failed to respond to his passionate sentences. Once launched on this swelling tide, and he drove swiftly on. Once exalted to this lofty height, and he soared away almost unconsciously. His form erected itself to that of proud manliness. His countenance was lighted by a strange expression, as he depicted this poor girl's wrongs. His eyes fairly burned in his head. His gestures were most strikingly earnest and impassioned.

It is enough to say, in conclusion, that his effort proved eminently successful in all points; for the jury were not out long in consultation, before they made up their verdict for five thousand dollars damages for the injured plaintiff. The result was hailed with applause by the spectators, whose sympathies had been with the young lady from the beginning.

As for Mr. Mark Holden himself, it was a day of triumph for him. He made an impression that was not so readily to be effaced. From that day his professional success was established.

Time brought about its usual changes. Mr. Martin married a fashionable lady before long, and they devoted themselves to the ordinary pursuits of fashionable folly. In this vortex of excitement they were swallowed up. Life in its true intent and meaning—life in its large and broad relations, they knew and cared nothing about. The whole of their existence consisted in the labor of trying to hurry through with it as fast as they could.

Mr. Holden, finding business inclined to grow upon him, not long after removed his office to the same city where Mr. Martin lived with his lady. Clients came thick and fast. Funds poured into his treasury. His labors were doubled and trebled in a short time, and friends accumulated as rapidly as his funds.

It was said very commonly of Mark Holden that he would become, if he lived, one of the foremost men at the bar. Already he had won universal respect and esteem, both by his talents and his conduct. He bore the character of an honorable, high-minded gentleman, whose promise at that time very much outran all his past performance.

But though some men may be once wealthy, whether by inheritance or not, there is no reason known why they are certain always to remain so. You cannot say that the rich man of to-day is to be the rich man of to-morrow too. Circumstances change. Risks intervene. Temptations often destroy the fairest hopes, and overturn the most stable calculations.

By a course of living such as almost any reader can easily imagine, Mr. Martin suddenly found himself standing, with his eyes open, staring poverty and ruin in the face. His wealth had all been fast slipping between his fingers. Fast living, gambling debts, ventures in fancy stocks, fleet horses and reckless companions, had in a few years made a wreck of Mr. John P. Martin's handsome estate, and left him, like a splendid ship stranded high and dry on the sand. He saw his fate, but he showed himself a coward in meeting it. For, unable to hold up under the accumulated weight of his calamities, he foolishly used the name of one of his acquaintances to a piece of paper, obtained the money on the same, and resolved to make one desperate venture in the way of retrieving his fortune. He was certain that he should be able again to take up the note before its maturity, and so avoid the consequences of exposure. Nothing to his view seemed easier.

But fate stood in his way. His last hazard failed him utterly. He staked all, and all was lost. There was nothing left him now but immediate exposure and lasting infamy. He thought of his former self, of what he might once have been, of his present reduction, and of the anguish of his trusting wife when she should be made acquainted with the truth, and he knew that it was more than his spirit was able to bear. So he resolved on a hasty flight, and on keeping his purpose a secret from every one.

But his resolution was taken too late. His guilt was discovered before he seriously thought of the possibility of it. An officer paid him a most unwelcome and unexpected visit one evening, while he was fondly dreaming of nothing but present security in his own house, and the former gentleman and man of fashion was escorted to a felon's cell to pass the night alone. A more terrible blow could not have fallen on the head of his wife, because the matter was still involved in a mystery that she was not able to explain.

When, however, the appalling fact became known to her, it seemed as if her reason must be dethroned. Such extreme suffering it was a very rare thing to witness. She raved like a maniac, shrieked and tore her hair, called on God to take her life at once, and wished a thousand times that she had never been born. It was pitiful to witness this overwhelming change in the poor woman's feelings. Could her husband have seen her, he would have cursed the hour that drew him into his last and fatal crime, and prayed to die. No man of a manly nature could have passed through such a terrible ordeal.

She went frequently to his cell to see him, but came away always less reconciled than before. Now she saw him poor, desolate and friendless. Every one forsook him. None of his old acquaintances cared where he was, how he fared, or whether he lived or died. She alone remained to him, devoted to the last.

Wild with excitement, she scarcely knew what to do with herself. She walked her apartments by the hour, and finally ended by walking the streets. By the way she traversed the stony walks, one would have thought her almost insane. That flushed cheek, that pale forehead and those white lips, the strangeness of that eye—these told sad tales of what had already been suffered, and what might soon be to come!

She overtook a little girl in the street one day, whose appearance at first sight interested her exceedingly. Stopping to look round in her face, she was struck with its expression; there was something there which she had not been looking to see.

So absorbed became she in the child, who could not have been more than eight or nine years old, that she asked her name, took her gently by the hand, and suffered herself to be led along wherever the child seemed disposed to go. A few steps took them to the door of a modest and humble residence, where the girl went in. Totally without purpose or wish, the despairing lady followed her.

Arrived in the inner room, she found a young looking woman seated at a table engaged in sewing. She was still handsome in her face, but her features betrayed too plainly the lines of deep and silent suffering. She half rose at the unexpected entrance of a stranger, but the latter lifted her hand in protest, and she kept her seat.

"Whose child is that?" said the lady. "Is it yours?"

"Yes," replied the mother, her mind swiftly revolving thoughts of abduction that made her restless in her chair.

"And your name; then, if you please, is—" she went on.

The mother hesitated. But the look of anguish that settled on her visitor's face hastened her determination.

"Mary Pease," was her frank answer.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed the stranger; and raising both arms above her, knelt at the astonished mother's feet.

When both found themselves in a measure composed, after this sudden excess of emotion, the wife narrated her story. Mary listened, and the tears trickled down her cheeks; for the guilty husband, the father of her own child, was still dear to her heart, from which he had never yet been a complete exile. When, therefore, she came to hear the distracted wife tell of her despair for her husband, and brought herself to think that he might yet be consigned to the state prison for a term of years, her heart refused the prudent counsels offered it by her head, and she declared that whatever she had should be contributed freely to the purposes of his defence against the crime charged upon him. She had not much money, but she begrudged none of it at a time like that.

"O, you are too kind!—you are too generous!" exclaimed the wife. "I cannot repay you!"

"It was once his," was the answer. "I took it from him for—for—you know what. He shall not want for any part of it now."

The interview between these two women was protracted and exciting. When it drew to a close, the wife embraced the unhappy mother with great tenderness, kissed the child, and promised to call again on the ensuing day.

Next day they went together to the prisoner's place of confinement. On entering the room, the overpowered man grew suddenly blind with what he saw, staggered and fell to the floor at their feet. No description of his wretchedness would be at all adequate. He beat his temples with his open hands, tore his hair, begged and begged again to be forgiven of the poor girl he had wronged, and upon whose life had always since rested that dark shadow, and wondered if Heaven had any more of its judgments in store for him. The three were together an hour. It was a strange meeting, fraught with a deep experience to each one of them.

Mary Pease shortly after found her way to the office of her old friend, Mark Holden, and there laid the whole matter before him. She was not willing to believe the prisoner a downright criminal, and asked to engage the lawyer's services. Well known as a criminal lawyer in the city, he did not hesitate to undertake the poor man's defence; for which services Mary promised to see that he was abundantly paid.

The case was called on. The court-room was filled. Among the rest was the prisoner's wife; she believed in him to the last. Mr. Mark Holden made an effort that was fully worthy of his reputation; and so successful was he in setting forth the extenuating circumstances before the jury, that they finally brought in a verdict of "not guilty." It was a great triumph for him, but a far more joyful event for his anxious client.

Thus was he free; and by the efforts of the same man whose professional abilities had once before been called to bear against him, and through the friendliness of the woman at whose door he had laid a monstrous wrong. God willing, he resolved that the rest of his life should be only a perpetual expiation for his sin. Together with his wife, he vowed to labor in the future for poor Mary Pease as one of his own unworthy household.

EZEKIEL AND DANIEL WEBSTER.

On one occasion, when Ezekiel was on a visit to his brother in Boston, after rising from a sumptuous dinner, Ezekiel turned to his brother, and said, with great solemnity, "Daniel, do you think we shall live till morning?" "Why? what do you mean?" said Daniel. "Don't you remember," said Ezekiel, "how, when we were boys at a certain time, we had no meal in the house, and could get no corn ground, and our mother fed us on potatoes and milk; and after the first supper, going up to bed, you turned around upon the broad stair and asked, with great seriousness, 'Ezekiel, do you think we shall live till morning?' 'Why?' said I. 'Only think what stuff we have been eating.'"—Christian Freeman.

REMARKABLE CONDUCT OF A HORSE.

Mr. Israel Abrahams, in the vicinity of this town, has a horse that will of his own accord, pump a sufficiency of water for all the other horses on the farm. We have witnessed him, when turned loose into the barn-yard, go directly to the pump, take the handle between his teeth, and throw the water with as much force, and almost as much regularity as a man would, until he would pump enough for his companions and himself, when he would drink and deliberately retire. No pains were ever taken, or means used, to learn him a business which proves a great accommodation to himself, and relieves his owner of considerable labor.—Centreville Times.

LA NINA.

BY FRANCIS W. BUTMAN.

THE city of Fiesole, in the great duchy of that name, was, at the time of which we write, the chosen resort of all the musical amateurs in the world. Whatever wars were freely waged in other quarters, here all were harmonious, or had been, till the prima donna of La Scala Theatre began to show signs of a waning voice and thin elbows. Then the merry signors, whose delight was in the opera, and the merry ladies, whose delight was in the signore, commenced murmuring so loudly that they quite drowned the weak notes of Madame Retz, and rendered the distracted tenore inconsolable. Affairs were in this state, when one day as the manager came out, his sleeve was twitched by a small girl who led him down an alley to the river-bank. Sitting on a stone, dipping her long, brown hair in and out of the water, was another child, although somewhat larger, and as she drew her hair up and down, she warbled, in enchanting accuracy, the most difficult scales of the manager's repertory of themes. Signor Morello stopped thunder-struck. A voice like that in Fiesole, and never before heard by him? A tone like a bell, deep and distinct in the lower notes, and clearer and sweeter in the higher range than Madame Retz had ever attempted, a compass of more than three octaves! That must be attended to. Who had taught her? Cimeriso. It could not have been any one else. That day the child was in the school for a few last exercises, but, probably, lest the city should learn of his treasure ere he was ready to produce it, was as quickly withdrawn and instructed in private, and one year afterwards our story commences.

Flaming placards were everywhere up on public walls and squares, announcing the debut of La Signora Florence, a new prima donna assoluta, in the great opera of the Miracle, upon the Monday of the next week. Oriers sung it round the streets and musical counts congratulated the beau monde on an acquisition who had been as yet utterly secluded from the gaze of every eye. The old maestro Morello kept his jewel hidden (after having suffered her to sing with his school a few hours a year ago), in some obscurity which not even Oedipus could discover.

"What do you say, signor marquis, to a voyage of discovery concerning this golden fleece?" cried the Count of Esporo to a tall, handsome young man, the Marquis de Napoli, who, leaning against a pillar, heard indifferently the eloquent tirade of Esporo.

"With all my heart," said he, and tightening his sword-belt, he bowed in the lowest possible bend to the rest of the company, and strode out with the count.

"A silent gauche!" remarked one gentleman, as he left.

"Not he," said a lady beside him. "There is no more graceful man in Florence, nor one of better parts."

"He hath an eye like an eagle," cooed another.

"And his lands are broader than an eagle's flight!" interrupted the gentleman, with a laugh.

"Were he not so silent, one could learn a thousand things of his life past and present, though to be sure, being so young, there cannot be much of the former," said the first lady. "How delightfully troublesome is this partial mystery!"

"I assure you," said the gentleman, "he makes no mystery of himself. He has been taught in the college at Rome till his nineteenth year. After that, five years' travel with his uncle, the cardinal; a year on his estate on the Arno; and here he is!"

Meanwhile, the object of these remarks was striding along with his companion, outside the city wall. They had wound a silent way for about a league, the sunset was gorgeous above, when a shriek and cry for help caused them to run rapidly forward to where a coach had been upset in the ruts, and some highwaymen, taking advantage of the opportunity were already busying themselves with its contents and threatening the life of its female occupant. The contest was but momentary ere the road was empty of obstructions, the highwaymen (for there are no more cowardly race of beings than Italian bandits) put to flight, and the coach righted.

"La Nina!" exclaimed the marquis, as coolly wiping his sword blade, he sheathed it, and kissed the fair hand of the rescued lady. "What chance brings thee here?"

"What chance bringeth my lord marquis to save me?" answered the lowest, sweetest voice in the world.

"Some angelic guidance. I shall see thee in the city?"

"Next Tuesday I receive company at the Palazzo Fiorini!"

"Not Monday? La Nina must not miss the great joy we expect. La Signora Florence, the new singer at La Scala, Monday night."

"I shall attend the opera; but under a rather different escort," she answered, with a haughty smile, and thanking her preservers, bade the coachman drive on, while she sank back from their sight within.

"Por Hercule! We came out for a golden fleece," said Esporo, "and we have a whole mine of jewels. By my sword! I never saw so perfect a loveliness in so small a compass in my life! Is't not?"

But the marquis, considerably mortified by the last haughty rejoinder of the lady, did not reply.

"Where didst meet her?" continued Esporo. "Eh? What if she have more friends than one, can you not say a word? Where did you first meet her?"

"Ah—" said the marquis, as if waking up. "She was left in charge of my aunt, the cardinal's sister, at my estate on the Arno, and I saw her frequently for about six months."

"Bah! and were not ennuied?"

"So? Not I. Books, poesy, draw, dance, drive, hunt; everything but music. The charming thing never could sing or play a note!"

"And you were there constantly all that time?"

"O, much longer! Not regularly though. My aunt, the cardinal's sister, insisted always that I should begone, the first half of every day, on my place a few miles further up the river; then frequently I took a run of a week or so, that she might miss me, wish me back, grow pale, or something."

"And did she?"

"Not she. The same smile, the same indifference. La Nina scarcely could have known my heart, and her coolness was exasperating. At the end of the time that I saw her, I neither knew her station, parentage nor whole name. My aunt always called her La Nina, and I took it up, and the servants added a marchesa on their own responsibility. And now thou hast it!"

"Come!" said Esporo. "We have strayed far enough. What care I for any prima donna assoluta? Is not La Nina before all the world?"

The eyes of the marquis flashed fire. Esporo laughed, and taking his arm they sauntered back.

Monday came. The day so longed for and counted upon. Every box in the theatre had been sold long since. No words were spoken but in reference to the evening. The ladies met and arranged most exquisite toilets; the gentlemen bought most superb bouquets; the jewellers' shops were ransacked; and even the grand duke and his whole train were to be present. Such a night had not shone over Florence for a hundred years; and when at last the sunset gun was fired, and the stars breathed themselves out large and radiant, the air was as clear as on a mountain top. Even a street-sweeper's song was sweet to-night, how sweet then must be the voices of that singer, whose equal Maestro Morello swore Italy had never dreamed of. The street was blocked up with carriages at an early hour, and only as each one disgorged its brilliant contents, could the next find room. Curtain after curtain of the boxes was drawn aside, and beauty after beauty flashed on the accustomed gaze of others. The great chandeliers hung more like blazing concentrations of the solar system than anything else, and crimson, gold and diamonds dazzled the bewildered sight. At last the grand duke and his courtiers thronged the royal boxes, and the orchestra burst forth in music. Though waiting with such eager impatience, the audience had sufficient appreciation to applaud the overture; that master piece of the mighty composer of the Miracle, and the great curtain quivered, parted and swept aside, as was then the custom. Of course they knew they should not see the new prima donna till the opening of the second act, and were quite prepared to see Madame Retz in her decade old attitudes, and hear her thin, cracked tones drawl, and render immortal beauties of conception into dreary platitudes, but with solemn patience they endured it, and only broke out in subdued hisses when the dissonance was more than usually unbearable. How different the enthusiasm, false though it was, which she had inspired ten years before. The Marquis de Napoli and his friend Esporo, was in the box with Madame Avanez, and after scanning every group present, Esporo whispered his belief that La Nina was not anywhere among them, of which remark Napoli took no notice, having already satisfied himself on the point some time before, and biting his lips and cursing the wretched performers, he became resigned to fate, and waited for to-morrow when he might see her.

At last the act was finished without one applaud, and the curtain covered the stage again. The silence was breathless in the interval, the suspense unbearable; ladies leaned forward; cheeks flushed vivid with expectation; even the grand duke stood up uncovered, awaiting; even the most indifferent person present felt his moustache and watched the curtain. It waved, separated, rolled away. On one side great dignitaries appeared seated, the other side was yet vacant; from its distance advanced a group of snow-clad handmaidens, who, separating, disclosed the long vista of a purple porphyry and white marble colonnade. They waited, the audience, they would testify nothing till they were sure. The orchestra played an adagio movement. A white hand appeared from behind the last column, a white foot, a long, black robe, and with a slow, flowing motion, the prima donna assoluta seemed fairly to swim up the distance; from her parted lips seemed to sigh a sound like the far-off warble of the nightingale, which, as she drew nearer, swelled till like a mighty volume of melodious music it broke on the ear as a wave does on the shore, and clearly and sweetly with a solemn force, rose flight after flight, trembled like the wings of a bird far up in blue air, and died away among the clouds as if at the gate of heaven; while standing full before them, her soft, brown hair flowing over her black robe, lustrous gilded-brown eyes up-raised, perfectly moulded hands and arms crossed over her bosom, she awaited their judgment.

A moment, as if to regain the breath they had lost in amazement and admiration, dead silence held, then, like thunder in the Apennines, the audience rose with one accord, shouted, applauded, showered flowers and jewels, waved handkerchiefs, smiled, and for some time rendered it impossible to proceed. Stooping, from among the collection, she took a single flower flung by the grand duke, which appeared to be a lily with the dew on it, but, as the weight instantly taught her, formed all of gems, and fastening it in her girdle, bowed and turned away.

"La Nina! La Nina!" cried the wonder-struck Napoli.

She moved slowly to the right and made the marquis an obeisance with the most bewitching smile, who, thus singled out before the house, neither smiled nor blushed, but only bowing, looked steadfastly upon her.

"Brown hair," muttered Esporo, "flowing outline, dainty foot, La Nina herself!"

"Be silent!" whispered the marquis, in a hollow tone, while grasping his arm as if in an iron vice; Esporo winced and did as he was bid.

With the same solemn pathos as it began, the scene ended, the trial was over, and Madame Retz again appeared, only to be hissed till she was joined by La Nina, who, covering her companion's deficiency, lending her an ornament or two from her own abundant stock of expressions, and marvellously executing the most difficult and impossible things, as if she were only breathing, won the respect as much as the admiration of her hearers. The action proceeded and the last scene arrived. Behind a prison grate, resting her cheek on her hand, sat La Nina. The prison bells sent out heavy tollings, the voice of La Nina, deep and rich, mocked their jangling, till, melting into a hymn, it clashed and chimed like an organ; honey dripping from the rocks was not sweeter, and powerful and clear as it was in its deep tones, it fell as lightly and accordantly on the ear as the ringing of hollow, silver bells, so exquisitely was it tempered. The cell filled with the officials of death, and still chanting, she paced out with them. They bound her to the stake; already the torch was applied and little flames leaped up around, while the house, completely carried away, was utterly still, when the withes shrank and broke; the black robe fell down; the white arms were lifted up; shining wings unfolded themselves on her shoulders; long, light drapery floated curvingly around her as she slowly rose above the stake, her voice echoing like reality the air with which she had first appeared. From far above, two-angels fell as slowly down to meet her at last, encircling her in their arms, and calmly and beautifully she floated up above the heavens, with her voice swelling and subsiding till it was lost in the upper darkness of her flight, and only a silver echo died, with delicate reverberations, away in the height. So wrapt had the audience been, with their eyes fixed on La Nina, that the stake and fagots with the painted flames and real torch had not received an instant's attention, and the supernumeraries, whose business it was immediately to quench the torch, were equally absorbed. Thus, when a mighty cry of "Fire! Fire! La Scala burns!" went up, and the scaffolding and curtains were already wreathing in tiny flames, judge of the terrific panic and confusion that ensued. Some shouted that the prima donna, who was still above, should be saved, a dozen young nobles indeed made the frantic exertion, others only struggled to extricate themselves. Esporo leapt upon the stage and leapt back again, at an angry word from above, to the side of Madame Avanes, while Napoli rushed wildly forward and shouted her name.

"I am here, signor," answered a voice overhead, coolly, and looking up he saw her sitting on a beam round which she had tied a rope. He ran to mount where she was.

"It is impossible," she cried, "Retz has hidden the ladders, I saw her. Hold this rope, signor," and she flung the other end down to him. He caught it, and instantly clasping it above in her little hands, she threw herself forward from the beam, swung a second, and then slid down beside him, the skin of her hands remaining on the rope. Taking her in his arms, Napoli rushed from the place and gained the street by the stage door. Hardly had he done so, when he was waylaid by another person.

"Whom hast thou?" questioned this last.

"Fare thy ways," returned Napoli, "thy highness must not play the robber with thy subjects!"

"Put La Nina down."

"I shall not be disobeyed if I dare to disobey," and Napoli strode onwards leaving the duke behind. At last she stood on her feet in the balcony of his palace.

"Why did La Nina conceal her identity from her friend?" he asked her, reproachfully, and putting his hands on her shoulders with strange familiarity, he held her there till she answered him.

"Il maestro forbade," she murmured.

"And hast thou no will or strength of thine own?"

"As for my will, do not let it concern thee, my strength thou confessest, and beyond these, I owe everything to Morello."

"Didst thou not love me, Florence, when we were together by the Arno?"

No answer.

"I know thou didst. Why then conceal it? Why never blush, never sigh, never be weary, never kindle with my presence, or pale at my absence?"

"I, the singing girl, might never aspire to the Marquis de Napoli's love."

"But thou mightest! thou shalt. Thou hast it!" Still nothing more. "Dost thou love me, La Nina?"

"Ay," and she lifted her brown eyes tremblingly towards him. Suddenly an arm, not his, encircled her, a form was between them, a dozen soldiers drew their swords before her; she was borne off struggling, by the duke and his guards before Napoli could lift his arm. Down the lawns and out into the crowded streets they went, picking their way in the turmoil, lighted glaringly by the burning theatre, to the ducal palace.

"Rest there, pretty dove, sweet singer!" said the duke, as they left her in a high, latticed room, and wound down into the street again.

She ran to the lattice, it was forty feet from the ground; there was but one door, it was fast locked. No flags, no panels, nothing but this comfortable, matter-of-fact prison. She had counterfeited this once to-night, it came in the force of reality a little too soon. If all the dainty ladies, who had envied her triumph to-night, could but see her now, where would their envy be? True, she remembered, there were very few who would refuse the fate now apparently thrust on herself. She tore violently at the lock and at last wrung her tender hands in despair.

A clang of quick steps on the stairs became audible; a dozen heels in the hall; a bunch of keys rattled without the door, one after another was inserted, suddenly the lock yielded, a small band, masked and armed, entered, and she was again seized and borne off.

"Trust me," whispered Napoli. "I pass for the duke. He was seen to leave here two minutes since, he is supposed to have returned, and now to be taking his prisoner to some securer place," and they were again in the thorough-fares.

"Halt there!" cried a stern, harsh voice, and a short, unarmed man alone, confronted Napoli, and laid his hand on La Nina's head.

"Move on!" commanded the marquis. "Stand aside, Maestro Morello!"

"Nay," pursued the little stranger. "My child, where art thou going? Why leavest thy loving master? Hast thou forgotten thine obligations, thy promise. Wilt thou break thy engagement at the theatre?"

"The theatre is destroyed," said La Nina.

"Miserable quibble! Tush! there are a thousand other places till it is rebuilt. El Domo for one."

But she still clung closely to Napoli.

"Thou wilt not? disgraceful girl! Then know that I force thee to leave him, and follow me, by the command of thy father!"

"My father?" asked she, wonderingly, repeating his words with a frightened air, and looking quickly up.

"Ay, child, thy father! If thou never knewest of him before, know it now. Thine own father. Come!"

She slid to her feet and followed him, leaving Napoli grinding his teeth at the sudden reprisals of the night, and the ill-luck that attended them. After an hour's walk in silence, La Nina and Signor Morello found themselves within the Palazzo Fiorini.

"Now," said she, "you will tell me all this that you long since ought to have informed me of. Art thou my father?"

"Nay, he is dead. I am his agent. La Nina, thou art in thine own thought naught but the singing girl of Fiesole. Yet listen. Fifteen years ago, a grand duke was our ruler here, whose equal earth never saw, whose superior heaven alone holds. He had one daughter five years old. One day, suddenly our dear lord died. The child disappeared, was said to have been drowned. Indeed the attempt, although supposed at the time to have been successful, was frustrated by some worthy peasants, whom we know, and she was preserved in secret albeit. The duke's brother took the coronet and now rules. Her existence came to my knowledge; her voice was miraculous. I knew of no way to restore her to her rights other than to perfect her musical education. Florence! Grand Duchess of Fiesole! I will bring thee to thy throne, but La Nina must bide my time!"

She waited an instant, and then said, "I am afraid of greatness. Even if all this is true, I do not desire it. Rather give me the quiet years of happy, Christian life you have just snatched me from!"

"The present duke is a tyrant," said Il Maestro; "he opposes the people, he slew thy father. Hast thou no wish to avenge him? no burning at thy heart to uplift these down-trodden races?"

A long time he thus harangued, setting the merits of the case before her, and promising her stores of greater happiness than she had ever dared wish for, and when at last he left her, La Nina was as determined to obtain her ducal crown and to redress the wrongs of her people, as any Jacobin alive could wish; and in order to accomplish this, was still to continue as the prima donna at another theatre under Signor Morello's management, and her appearance there was shortly announced.

Meantime the Count Esporo was sitting at the feet of Madame Arvanex in a consultation more barbarous than amorous. It will be sufficient to give the end at which they arrived.

"See!" said madame, "how Napoli loves her! how he starts and flushes. It must never be. We cannot lose him so. What will become of our faro tables, our banks, our billiards? It must never be!"

"I cannot forget," muttered Esporo, "his unspoken rebukes to me. His hauteur and overbearing lordliness, nor his insolence. By heaven, I can endure no rival! Yes, let the revenge be quick and deadly!"

"She sings again Thursday at the Domo. We will be there. Do you bring me, when you come, the two bunches of violets. At the last moment, I will impregnate one with the drugs; that one she shall smell, Retz will make sure of that; the other I retain. She will die, as others have died before her!"

"I shall not fail!" and he did not.

When the promised Thursday arrived, the same scene, even if not a more eager one, of impatience and admiration was enacted, and when the noble music of Iphigenie had been rolled off with the classic elegance that only a pupil of Cimeriso could attain, as they all declared, the Signora Florence was called before the curtain. She obeyed the call, but attired in so superb and singular a costume, as to excite the astonishment and admiration of all; but before her appearance it will be necessary to relate a scene of a minor melodrama that passed in the presence of Madame Avenex.

The Marquis de Napoli had stood half hidden behind the drapery of his own box, and now, leaning slightly forward looked round the house. His gaze turned upon Madame Avanez and Esporo in the box opposite. He saw, as he stood, that madame held a bouquet a little lower than the public view, and from a tiny, perforated casket of gold was saturating the beautiful blossoms with what Napoli did not doubt was deadly poison. When Esporo had bought the two bunches that morning, the marquis had accompanied him, and in the freak of the moment, had bought a similar one, which he now held. Knowing it would be useless to endeavor to warn the prima donna, he lost not a moment in seeking the box of Madame Avanez, and saluting that lady just an instant before La Nina appeared before the curtain, in her dazzling apparel, and gracefully leading Retz to share the applause. The poisoned bouquet lay on the cushion before Madame Avanez, and as the marquis apologized for passing before her vision that he might gain the station at her left, he most adroitly, and entirely unperceived, substituted his own in its place and dropped that upon the floor. Madame Avanez's face was feverish and her eyes blazing, as rising with her cavaliers, she joined in the acclamations of the house; Esporo's countenance expressing a bitter hate joined to a sarcastic sense of power; and a triumphant smile playing round the lips of the Marquis de Napoli.

Bending forward Madame Avanez uttered a laugh so peculiar as to be quite audible and to catch the attention of Retz. This done, she lifted her hand and tossed the bouquet to the stage. Catching it ere it fell, Madame Retz, smiling and throwing back her head, presented it to the unsuspecting singer, who gaily smelled it, and bowed to the donor. Madame Avanez had expected to see the ghastly rigidity of a corpse; here were smiles and life. She stared immovably at the stage a minute, then glanced at Esporo and sank back in her seat. Napoli stooped and picked the poisoned violets from the floor.

"Madame," said he, bowing and holding them out at arm's length, "I must beg forgiveness for the substitution of my own flowers in the place of yours. La Signora Florence did not use the bouquet you intended for her. May I dare prescribe it for yourself?" and placing it on the cushion where he found it, he left the box.

Whether overcome by rage and terror, or by the already penetrating aroma of the subtle drugs, Madame Avanez fainted; and upon being carried into the open air which quickly revived her, was never again seen in Fiesole. Esporo returned to the theatre. The disposition of affairs had undergone a slight change during his absence, but had an earthquake rolled at his feet, he could not have been more overwhelmed. On the front of the stage stood La Nina, as he saw her before in flowing robe and train of white satin and green Genoa velvet. On her head was a magnificent crown. True she was thus arrayed, and as he thought singularly, before he went out; six giants of the royal guard stood behind her; the little maestro, with the lord chancellor of the duchy were rather in advance, and the Marquis de Napoli, holding her hand, was by her side. Retz and the other myrmidons had vanished. An expression of joy and amazement was on the countenances of the thousands who thronged the place, and the grand duke was standing in his half-deserted box, purple with rage and trembling. The little maestro's voice rang like a trumpet as he rehearsed the circumstances with which the reader is already acquainted, with a particularity impossible of admitting a doubt, and called up witness after witness. At last the duke seemed able to command his voice and a word sprang to his lips.

"It is naught," he roared. "Where are my guards? Seize the liars! the impostors!"

But the cunning little maestro, too well used to deploying his theatrical forces, and to obtaining a thousand things by stratagem alone, had not left a single guard free to obey the duke's command.

"Is this naught, thou usurper?" cried Morello; and taking from the hand of La Nina a scroll of parchment, he unrolled, displayed and read a mandate from the pope, sealed with the golden bull, and declaring Florence the rightful and only ruler, Grand Duchess of Fiesole.

The grand duke bent forward, white, where just now he was purple, a red stream flowing from his lips; his demoniacal passions had slain him, and apoplexy had taken off its victim. He was dead.

"My people!" said Florence, no longer La Nina, advancing a step with Napoli, while the others fell back, "although my father was your duke, not without your own will and election will I take his place." And all the assembly hurraed, and the words were taken up by the surging populace without, who had already heard the intelligence.

"Long live our prima donna! Long live Florence, Arch-Duchess of Fiesole!"

Thus it came that the nightingale sitting on an olive spray, together with the noble arms of the Napoli, were quartered on the escutcheon of the oldest and greatest of Italian houses.

Fragility is founded on the principle that all riches have limits.

MY FIRST LOVE.

BY ELISA F. MORIARTY.

My heart is thrilled with tender joy,
Which nothing now can mar,
Communing with its love-born thoughts—
Most blessed thoughts they are;
For she is near, my soul's first love,
Its heavenward guiding star.

She's modest as the violet,
And gentle as the dove;
Her noble mind and sympathies,
Her trust, her truth, her love,
Her patience and humility
A beauteous soul do prove.

Her name's the first in memory's book,
And ay, 'twill be the last,
Her love-smile glids the present time,
It sanctified the past,
And round my way its influence
Forever will be cast.

And I have seen her dear eyes weep,
Blest privilege of mine;
I kissed her falling tears away,
The while my arms would twine
Around her neck in mute caress,
Our love seemed half divine.

I gazed upon the azure skies,
That tell the heavenly goal,
And look into her sweet blue eyes,
They half reveal her soul;
Her God he sees the inner light,
The beauty of the whole.

My heart is filled with holy joy,
No clouds its hopes o'ercast,
In fancy's eye the future glows,
In memory's the past;
While she is near, my mother dear,
My first love and my last.

THE HEART'S RESOLVE.

BY OPHELIA M. CLOUTMAN.

On the banks of the beautiful Clyde was the home of Jeanie Grahame; the sole idol of aged parents and the pride of the entire hamlet. In all Scotland, the eye could not have sought a more lovely resting-place than upon the charming Scottish hut, whose latticed windows were nearly screened from observation by the thick-spreading ivy, overrunning in many places the low flat roof.

But in truth, the loveliest feature of our Highland picture was none other than Jeanie herself. Her eyes of liquid blue contrasted most beautifully with her own rose-tinted complexion and wealth of golden ringlets. Arrayed in a closely-fitting kirtle of blue, which served only to set off to advantage her somewhat slight and girlish figure, one might have thought her the noble descendant of the unfortunate Queen of Scots, rather than the humble peasant girl she was.

On the opposite bank of the river rose to sight the old ancestral castle of the once illustrious Montaine family. But two members of that distinguished line of royalists now survived; the young Lord of Montaine, who had seen some twenty-five summers, and his sister, Lady Montaine, some two or three years his junior. A most imposing appearance this fine old castle presented by moonlight, with its gloomy looking front of massive granite, and its spacious courtyard. Then, too, it was situated far distant from any other royal residence of the kind, and being on a slight elevation of land, leading up from the river, it seemed like a giant tower frowning upon the low and vine-clad huts of the surrounding peasantry.

The parents of Jeanie Grahame were the tenants of the Lord Montaine; and they of course looked up to their land-holder with the same awe and reverence that the meanest subject of royalty looks up to its Supreme Ruler. As for the young lord, but little that is commendable can be said of him, save that by his generosity and good humor he had won the hearts of a greater part of his tenants. During the winter season, he spent most of his time in Edinburgh, where he indulged in a continual round of gaiety and dissipation, so that for at least six months of the year, his sister was left sole mistress of the ancestral abode. This lady was exceedingly aristocratic, and prided herself greatly upon her noble birth and family; and there was about her manner a degree of haughtiness and reserve which chilled even the warm heart of "fair Jeanie" (as the peasantry termed her) whenever she was sent, as was frequently the case, on an errand to the castle.

At the time of which I write, Jeanie had just entered upon her eighteenth year, and though merry and blithesome as a lark, she was never mirthful to excess; and there was something in the high brow and finely chiselled mouth which bespoke firmness and determination far beyond her years.

I have said that Jeanie was the idol of her parents; and well might that aged pair have cherished her tenderly, for death, that untimely destroyer, had snatched from their grasp child after child, until none but little Jeanie was left to them. She was so kind and gentle—an ever ministering angel to their wants and comfort—that one who did but once look upon her could not fail to love her. In short, she was ever a general favorite with both old and young; and if the Scottish lasses sometimes envied her the beauty she possessed, and the admiration she excited from the other sex, they could not but feel within their hearts that it was all richly deserved.

But of the crowd of admirers that followed in her train, there was but one on whom the fair maiden bestowed more than ordinary marks of favor. And this was Donald McAlland, the son of a near neighbor, and likewise one of the tenantry. To many this unassuming youth would have offered but slight attraction, for he was not rich, nor even well-to-do, in the world's goods and chattels; nor was he particularly fair in person.

Many wondered what there was in him Jeanie saw and admired; and there was some jealousy manifested by the Scottish lads when on any little festive occasion, at which Jeanie was always the acknowledged belle, she permitted him to be her chevalier and escort. The parents on both sides could not fail to notice the daily growing intimacy of the youthful pair, which was fast ripening into love. And I need not say that for a time the matter was highly approved of by the old people.

There were times, however, when Mrs. Grahame would say with a sigh, as she beheld the youthful pair strolling arm-in-arm through the fields, "It's a pity Jeanie was not born a queen"—so ambitious is a mother's love! And then she too would wonder that one who had ever been idolized and cherished from her earliest infancy could look with favor upon one who seemed so much her inferior.

She did not know that Jeanie had discovered beauty far beneath the surface which her eye had failed to discern. Yes, Donald was the happy possessor of as noble a soul and as manly a heart as were ever implanted in the breast of mankind! And Jeanie loved him for his sound mind, his generous heart and noble energy of purpose, rather than for any outward charm he possessed. He did not flatter or seek to dazzle her eyes with the sordid gold of the world; for of wealth he had but little—and of flattery, still less. No, it was for himself alone that she lavished upon him her sweetest smiles, and tuned her heart in harmony with his.

And Donald, plain and honest heart, the envy of his sex, and the fortunate possessor of Jeanie's best affections, how did he love her! With the whole strength of his noble nature; he worshipped her as the pagan does the saint, in sculptured niches. Yes, she alone was the god of his idolatry. And yet in her presence he could not but feel reserve at times, for it seemed to him that she was lifted far above him in all that was beautiful and truthful; his superior in intellect and mind as well as in person. The days and weeks passed swiftly by to those two loving hearts; for as yet no cloud had interposed to darken with its shadow the sunshine of their happy hearts.

It was quite early in the fall when the carriage of Lady Montaine drew up before the humble cot of Robert Grahame. All were not a little surprised at seeing so unexpected a visitor, who hastily descended from the carriage and prepared to enter the house. Old Mrs. Grahame dropped her knitting and hastened to open the door, for she knew that it must be some important matter that could thus call abroad the lady of Montaine Castle at so early an hour in the morning; for when the young lord was home, he was ever wont to come himself on affairs of business.

With an air of aristocratic dignity, she coldly took the proffered chair from which Jeanie had just risen, and proceeded at once to communicate her errand.

"I have come, Mrs. Grahame," she said, "to obtain the loan of your daughter for my dressing-maid and companion. Unexpected business has called my brother to the city much earlier than usual; and as he intends passing the winter in town, as is his custom, I am determined never again to pass so lonely a winter as that of last year. The castle is so large and gloomy that without the aid of society it is enough to give one a settled melancholy, if not to make them a confirmed misanthrope."

"Has the young lord gone so soon?" asked Jeanie. "Why, it was but yester-morn that I saw him talking with my father near the bridge which spans the river."

"Yes, and it is to my brother's suggestion that you owe the honor of this visit," said the lady, with a toss of her fine oval head. "He has eulogized so much the beauty and charms of Jeanie Grahame that I have thought best to make you the above proposition."

Jeanie blushed deeply at the cold flattery of the last remark, and a shade of anxiousness passed over her face as she awaited her mother's reply to the proffered offer.

"For how long a time would you require her services?" asked Mrs. Grahame; "for she is very dear to us, and is the sunlight of our home."

"I should like, if possible, to have her come at once, and remain during the winter months, if agreeable to herself," she said.

"I will go, but with one condition," said the girl; "which is, that I may be allowed to return home at nightfall; for it would grieve my heart to feel that I was entirely isolated from my dear parents, and shut up, as it were, in the depths of yonder dreary castle."

Just then she caught her mother's reproachful glance, and feeling that she had spoken too hastily, she said, with a low curtsy, as Lady Montaine rose to depart:

"I will consider the matter, and bring you word on the morrow."

It was of course a source of regret to Jeanie to leave parents and home; for it was the first time that she had ever thought of absenting herself from them, even for a single day. And then, too, she would be deprived of Donald's sweet society, in a great degree; but she could in part compromise the matter if the favor of returning home at night should be allowed her. And so after much thought and long talking upon the subject, it was decided that Jeanie should go to the castle in the capacity of lady's maid.

The morrow found Jeanie at the castle gate; not in her usual high spirits, however, for she dreaded the thought of seclusion within its pillared halls and Gothic chambers, into which the sun's rays seemed never to penetrate. The Lady Montaine received her with more than customary graciousness; and her proposal of returning home nightly was willingly acceded to by her.

Donald, too, felt not a little downhearted at the idea of even so trivial a separation from his heart's idol. But Jeanie playfully bantered him upon his lack of gaiety, and bade him not wear so long and puritanical a face on the occasion of her going so short a distance, and for so short a season.

"What would you say, Donald, if the broad ocean were to separate us," she said, "instead of the river banks? Then indeed might each heart have cause for grief."

Alas! she little knew then that those words, so thoughtlessly spoken, were prophetic of what the future was seen to bring forth.

Jeanie Grahame was soon established in her new quarters, and as she had determined to make the best of her condition for the time being, she soon entered upon her duties with earnestness and zest.

After all, there was much within that old building which well accorded with her tastes and feelings; for Jeanie was at times not a little thoughtful, and she often loved to indulge herself in day-dreams of the olden times when "brave knights and fair ladies" mingled with pleasure in the animated sports of the chase, and the too often dangerous joust or tournament.

Her time was spent mainly in the boudoir and apartments of her mistress, who being somewhat fond of retirement, was never so happy and contented as when listening to the glowing eloquence of Jeanie's words, as clearly and beautifully she read aloud to her the thrilling romances of the olden time; or poured forth in one continual burst of melody the Scottish ballads of the immortal Burns. She saw but little company at the castle; for as the winter crept on, the city friends began to fall off; and if perchance an occasional visit was made by a friend, the reception was always attended with so much formality and ceremony that Jeanie had no desire to become a participant in its cold enjoyments. As the severity of the weather increased, Jeanie found it impossible to make such frequent visits to her home, and with the sweet society of her books and flowers, and the daily correspondence of Donald, she became quite content and happy in the once gloomy old castle.

The Lady Montaine herself became conscious of a growing attachment for the fair maiden, whose society and intercourse had become so indispensable to her happiness. But it was evident to Jeanie that there were still certain bounds of propriety and etiquette which even then she might not overstep; for there was at times a chilling and freezing reserve manifest in the presence of her mistress, which seemed to check and restrain for the time any sudden gush or burst of feeling which her loving nature might betray or exhibit.

It was early on one cold, frosty morning in December, while performing her lady's toilet, that the porter handed to Jeanie a slip of paper, on which was written in a hurried hand the following words:

"Come down to the court-yard, my own dear Jeanie; for I have sad news to communicate."
"DONALD."

Hastily excusing herself, she descended with a beating heart and trembling limbs to the court-yard; for as she had not been home for more than a week, she was fearful that something had transpired there, the disclosure of which was entrusted to Donald's care.

Her first glance at the anxious and troubled countenance of her lover only served to confirm her fears. In vain she tried to speak, but her very tongue seemed cleaving to her mouth. With a sudden effort she gasped "My mother!" and but for the strong and manly arm of Donald she would have fallen powerless to the earth.

"Calm yourself," said the devoted youth, as trembling and agitated he folded her to his breast. "All—all is well at home!"

These words seemed to revive her instantaneously, and placing in her hands a newly opened letter, Donald bade her a hasty adieu; for he could not bear to witness the effect which the words there penned would have upon his loved Jeanie. Already he felt his heart-strings giving way, and quickly he turned from the spot.

Quickly those eyes of deepest blue scanned the burning lines before her, which were from a rich uncle of Donald's—a Scotch quaker, who had long since emigrated to the New World, and was at that time a resident of Philadelphia. Having accumulated an immense fortune by great industry and thrift in the mercantile trade of that city, he proposed to relinquish his business to his favorite nephew, Donald. And as he was a steadfast bachelor of long standing, he would of course become his sole heir at his death; for he had no near relatives in the New World.

For a few moments Jeanie stood like one transfixed to the spot; then carefully folding the letter and placing it in her breast, she ascended to her lady's dressing-room, apparently as composed as if nothing unusual had occurred. But when once escaped from the society of her mistress, she threw herself upon her couch and wept bitter tears at the thought of entire separation from her lover. And then hope would regain the mastery in her heart; for surely Donald could not think for a moment of leaving home and her for so uncertain and hazardous an adventure, and at such an unpropitious season of the year, when old ocean seemed ever frowning upon the traveller, and tossed the ship upon its surface madly about, as if it were but a mere bauble in the air.

That evening Jeanie despatched a note to Donald, for him to meet her at her father's home; which interview was willingly granted. It now became Donald's turn to struggle with self, and keep up his hitherto unflinching courage.

"Jeanie," he said, with composure, "I have not decided upon the course to pursue, without having first given the matter serious and weighty consideration. 'Tis true I may not tell you how much and deeply I shall regret leaving those dear parents of whom I have so long been the stay and comfort, and whose days seem fast waning; but I am satisfied that it is my duty to go, though my heart be crushed and my spirits bowed down at the thought of leaving all that is dearest on earth behind me. I am poor, and have parents dependent upon me for their daily support and maintenance; shall I then, my own Jeanie, let pass unheeded so bright an opening as that which the future spreads before me?"

He paused for a reply; but as he got none, he continued:

"If I stay here, I may not hope even for wealth; for living under such a system of government, I see not how I can ever rise to be other than the servile tool of the proud and wealthy landholder. No, Jeanie, I will go to America," and his eye flashed strong determination as he spoke; "there I will toil until death, if it must be, to secure for you, my betrothed, a home of affluence and ease, and a station in society befitting your pure and intellectual soul. There no one will deem the beautiful and accomplished wife of Donald McAllan the once lowly peasant girl—the serving-maid of the haughty Lady Montaine." And the excited youth spoke with a tone of dignity more fitting a king than a serf.

"Go, then," said Jeanie, smiling through her tears, "and may God's blessing follow and prosper you; for your pleading eloquence has changed my heart, and I can meekly bear my portion of the sacrifice which must indeed be made."

"Since duty prompts, the sooner you leave, Donald, the better it will be for both," she said, as with a kiss of sacred love upon her pale brow, the youthful lover bade her "good night" at the castle gate. "You remember, Donald, my idle words a few weeks since—'what if oceans divide us, instead of the river banks?'"

"I do. Alas! how strangely true and prophetic!" he said, as he turned to retrace his steps homeward.

The time for Donald's departure was soon fixed; and with many pledges of eternal fidelity the lovers parted for months—years—perchance forever!

Time flew by, and with the approach of spring, Jeanie anticipated with joy her coming release, but still the Lady Montaine held her prisoner. So very essential had she become to her naturally dull household that she had half a mind to adopt her as her own child; or rather make her the protegee of the high-born and wealthy mistress of Montaine Castle; but to this she knew the aged parents would never consent, while living.

"My brother will soon be here," said Lady Montaine, one morning, entering her boudoir, and addressing Jeanie, who was busily engaged upon a piece of delicate needlework; "for here is his letter, which says 'you may expect me in two weeks; when I expect to see my sweet little Jeanie duly installed as one of the household.'"

At these words Jeanie Grahame's blood boiled within her. How dare he call her so familiarly his "sweet little Jeanie?" "No," thought she, "I will no longer stay at the castle to be made the subject of his rude jests and undue familiarity." And then she told the Lady Montaine of her anxiety to return home, so long had she been absent. To this the lady would not hear at first, but Jeanie's strong will triumphed; and she made her preparations to return home within the space of ten days.

"Thus," thought she, "I will elude his grasp, heartless fop as he is!" For rumor had brought strange reports of the young lord's extravagance at the capital, as well, too, of his entire lack of morality.

On the morning previous to Jeanie Grahame's proposed departure for home, she arose very early; for she wished, as it were, to take farewell of all the scenes, both in nature and art, which for the last few months had been so dear to her heart. After passing through the conservatory, where even the flowers reposed with folded petals and drooping heads, as if not yet awakened from their sleep, she passed out into the spacious court-yard, where all was still and silent; for at that early hour not one of the inmates of the castle were stirring. She had but just gained the centre of the court-yard, when the sound of approaching wheels arrested her attention, and ere she could divine their import, a loud knock at the gate startled the porter from his slumbers in the lodge. In one moment the master and lord of Montaine Castle stood before her.

Approaching her quickly, he said, "Thus do I kiss the dew from off thy leaves, sweet flower," as bending low, he placed upon her damask cheek a rude kiss.

"Sir!" said Jeanie, drawing up her graceful form to its utmost height, "your boldness is unpardonable."

"My dear Jeanie," he said, very sarcastically, "words cannot express the joy of this unexpected morning surprise and welcome."

"You flatter yourself greatly, Lord Montaine, if you think my appearance in the court-yard was otherwise than accidental," said Jeanie, coldly; "for I believe your sister did not expect you for some days yet."

"I doubt it not," the young lord said, in a most gracious tone; "but really, I am very happy at the thought of having such a bright and charming companion as yourself to help beguile the dull monotony of rural life. But laying aside all flattery, Jeanie, I must tell you that I have not seen in all Edinburgh so fair a face and fine a form as yours."

"I assure you, Lord Montaine, that your heartless flattery is quite uncalled for and unheeded, as I trust that the morrow's setting sun will find me re-established and once again in my own home."

"Not so soon, my little maid!" said the imperturbable lord, following the maiden into the hall.

"I will at once arouse your sister," said the now provoked and insulted Jeanie, as she sprang up the broad stairway. "She will doubtless give you a most cordial welcome."

The following day Jeanie prepared for her return home; and although her mistress was still unwilling to part with so cheerful a companion, no inducement that was offered could make her remain longer. As she was about to depart, the young lord stepped forth, and, politely handing her into the coach, begged leave to accompany her home; but with a haughty bow, she declined his kindly offer.

Never were parents so happy as old Mr. and Mrs. Grahame were at their child's return; and never seemed that lovely home one half so bright and beautiful to Jeanie's admiring eyes as on the morning after her arrival. Bright and beautiful seemed the dawning future to that young heart; for she had received a letter from Donald, assuring her of his safe arrival and the brilliant prospects in store for him.

She was skilfully engaged in twining a wreath of laurels, interspersed with fine white flowers, and warbling with her bird-like throat that sweetest of Scottish songs, "Mary of Argyle," when a gentle rap at the door announced the presence of a visitor. She lifted the latch, and started as she again beheld Lord Montaine; but he, with a low bow, respectfully asked for Mrs. Grahame—though, in truth, Jeanie herself was the magnet which had drawn him to that humble hut. She, glad of a chance to escape, quickly ran to call her mother; nor did she again appear until after the young lord had taken his departure.

Day after day was the lord of Montaine Castle a visitor at the hut of Robert Grahame, and in looks and actions strove to win the heart of the beautiful maid to himself. The rarest of flowers were daily sent her from the conservatory, and fair jewels were his proffered gifts, thinking thereby to dazzle and attract her eye. But to all his protestations of love she turned a deaf ear, much to the annoyance of her mother, who felt not a little vexed at her entire refusal of his suit. In vain she told the lord that her heart and hand were long since given to another; and not even the wealth of the mines of Golconda could cause her to relinquish her deep and holy love for Donald.

"Out of sight, out of mind," he would say to her; "and if prosperous, Donald would more likely forget his old love, and take to himself a bride of high birth and station in America; and then, when it was too late—she deserted and rejected—would regret having refused his noble offer."

Thus to accuse Donald of such injustice and cruelty was more than Jeanie's sensitive nature could bear; and with the well-aimed arrow still rankling in her breast, she bade him leave her presence forevermore, nor seek to taunt her with his insolent proposals.

Of Lord Montaine's offer and constant addresses, Jeanie informed her lover in her letters to him; and but for the implicit faith and confidence which Donald reposed in Jeanie, he would have had much cause for alarm.

A year passed by, and still the Lord Montaine lingered in his castle, and not even the amusements of Edinburgh could offer him any attraction. 'Tis true he loved the beautiful Scottish maid with all the ardor and affection of which his soul was capable; but it availed nothing! Wealth and position could not buy the heart and hand of the constant and faithful Jeanie.

Vainly her mother strove to coax and induce her daughter to yield her consent to marry the young lord, as she placed before her eyes the heavy silks and jeweled caskets, which were the unnoticed gifts of Lord Montaine. But no! the jewels of her heart far outvalued in purity and beauty the snowy pearls within the silver casket.

"Take them and him forever from my sight!" she cried; "for nought on earth can dissuade me from my purpose—to marry Donald!"

Ah! woman's faith, more greatly art thou to be desired than all the wealth of India, or the gems of the ocean depths!

Two years from the time that Donald left home and native land, his feet pressed once again the shores of his much-loved Scotland. Towards the home of his birth the young man first directed his steps; and there an unexpected surprise awaited him, for Jeanie had known of his coming, and had kindly gone over to assist Mrs. McAllan in arranging some little luxuries for the comfort of the traveller. And there she was, the same dear Jeanie as of old, save that time had only served to ripen and mature those charms of person which were but the external covering of greater beauty within.

Now that Donald had indeed prospered, and was become the sole heir of his uncle's extensive property (whose decease took place a year after Donald left for America), the old folks could not of course do otherwise than give their consent to the speedy union of the devoted pair. At the end of one short week the rustic church of the little hamlet was the scene of a lovely and imposing ceremony—the union of Donald and Jeanie.

Beautiful looked the bride in her snowy robe of muslin, and her veil of delicate lace falling about her like a fine mist, fastened upon her golden curls only by a wreath of myrtle. And Lord Montaine was there to congratulate the too happy bride; for deeply as he had felt the sting of her refusal, still he could not find in his heart to dislike Jeanie—though, it must be said, he envied not a little Donald McAllan his lovely prize. And even Lady Montaine seemed to have lost somewhat of her native coldness in the warm and heartfelt pressure of the hand she gave to Jeanie.

It was Donald's intention to have taken the parents of both himself and Jeanie to America with them; but old Mr. and Mrs. Grahame declared themselves much too old to undertake so long a journey to the New World; for, to their weak and dimmed eyes, heaven seemed nearer to the view! So Donald was to provide for them a more comfortable home in their own loved Scotland.

The happy wedding party, consisting of Donald and his charming bride, together with Mr. and Mrs. McAllan, the aged parents of the former, were soon on their way to the city of Philadelphia, where a beautiful home was awaiting them, resplendent with all the luxury that wealth could procure, and over which the beautiful Jeanie McAllan is now the presiding genius.

THE BEST TIME TO FRET.

Two gardeners had their crops of peas killed by the frost, one of whom, who had fretted greatly and grumbled at his loss, visiting his neighbor some time after, was astonished to see another fine crop growing, and inquired how it could be.

"These are what I sowed while you were fretting," was the reply.

"Why, don't you ever fret?"

"Yes, but I put it off till I have repaired the mischief."

"Why, then, there's no need to fret at all."

"True, that's the reason I put it off."—Saturday Evening Post.

GENUINE COURTESY.—True courtesy, genuine politeness, is the offspring of good nature and a kind heart. It is as far removed from the artificial stateliness of fops and coxcombs, as the sun is from swagger and bluster; as far removed from arrogance and overbearing authority, as is the centre of the globe from its circumference. A true gentleman is a true man, no matter who his father was.

MARY.

BY E. T. HERTON.

Hard by a rippling fountain, where the waters love to play,
Where the fairest flowers that blossom are opening thro'
the day,
In a vine-clad cottage dwells sweet, laughing, bright-eyed May.

O, I wish that you could see her, with her step so light and airy;
For I know that you would love her, she is such a winsome fairy;
Sometimes we call her darling May, and sometimes our sweet Mary.

Could you seek the vine-clad cottage at the starry evening hour,
When the tiny dew-gems glisten on each weeny, drooping flower,
You would see sweet Mary kneeling in her own dear favorite bower.

Should you see her in the morning, in her robe of purest white,
With a few sweet wild flowers woven mid her tresses long and bright,
You would long to call her darling, and whisper your delight.

She's no stranger to caresses nor affection's beaming smile,
May the brightest angels guard her, for she is a petted child;
Loving, smiling, and caressing, may she never dream of guile.

MY AWKWARD FRIEND.

BY MRS. N. T. MUNROE.

GOOD Mrs. Harrison had seen "better days;" she had moved in the "best society;" her husband had been rich; and she, as the wife of a rich man, had been thought a good deal of by others—and, it must be owned, by herself, too. But one day Mr. Harrison died, and, as is not unusually the case, it was ascertained that he was not as rich as had been expected. He had lived well, and had he not died, it is probable he would have continued to live well, by means best known to himself; but his decease was a most unfortunate thing for his family in a pecuniary point of view.

To be sure, Mrs. Harrison had a little property of her own; but then she could not live as she had lived; she could not keep her carriage, nor her half-dozen servants; she could not keep up the grand establishment she had been keeping; she could not entertain company every day, could not set her table with all the luxuries of the season, nor indulge herself and daughter in all those little extravagances and follies which women so delight in;—in fine, she could not live on a thousand a year as she had been living on six or eight thousand.

It was hard for a proud, high-spirited woman like Mrs. Harrison to economize and retrench in the face and eyes of the fashionable world in which she had once moved with such a keen relish of its delights. How could she ever consent to see her daughter eclipsed by the proud Misses Carr, or herself looked down upon by the supercilious Mrs. Dunn? So Mrs. Harrison, after her husband's death, bought a pretty house, situated in a small town of an adjoining State, and packing up all her earthly goods, left the city where she lived in such splendor and station far behind.

So we make our acquaintance with Mrs. Harrison in the little town of B—, where she was enabled, by means of her small property, helped along by genteel methods not beneath her to practise, to make quite a respectable appearance. Yet she and her daughter never forgot what they had been, and many were the comparisons drawn between their present style of living and that to which they had been accustomed.

It was indeed a fall to come down from six servants to one; from one's own horse and carriage to plebeian cars and omnibuses; to be obliged to save one's silk for Sunday and company wear, and don de laines and muslins for every day; and, the most unkindest cut of all, to renounce the "best society" of the city of Y— for that of a country town, whose inhabitants, though intelligent, and kind, and social, had never moved in good society, were unversed in its conventionalities, and in company had even been seen to eat with their knives and pour their tea into their saucers.

Delia Harrison was really a fine girl. She was interesting and intelligent, could talk well, had read a great deal, and had an original and superior mind. Her personal appearance was also very prepossessing; she was ladylike and graceful, without being commonplace and uninteresting. But yet the family weakness clung to her, a love for the forms and ceremonies of fashionable life, and the thought of what they had been and the position they had occupied, was to her, as to her mother, a source of never-ending regret.

Mrs. Harrison had one spare room, and so, like the Widow Bardell, of Pickwick memory, she advertised board for single gentlemen. Tom Stebbins and myself had been college chums, and were great friends. We were in search of a boarding-place to pass the summer and pursue our studies. We saw the advertisement, called upon the lady, found the terms satisfactory to all parties, and took the room.

Tom was a close student, a fellow of fine mind, decided talent and no little genius. He was a man to make his mark in the world, and I was always proud of Tom wherever we went—that is after people got acquainted with him, for at first he was not prepossessing. He was not bashful; no, Tom had been in good society—though perhaps a stranger might doubt it—he was not bashful, he did not think enough of appearances to make him bashful, but he was—yes, he was—awkward; that is, awkward in some things—in his attitude and in his person. He was careless of his appearance, and paid no regard to the customs and conventionalities of modern society. If there was a word in the English language the student did not seem to comprehend, that word was etiquette, and if there was one he was utterly regardless of, it was dress.

But he had a great, generous soul beneath this rough exterior; he had a love of the true, the noble, the good and the beautiful, and he was as warm-hearted and glorious a being as ever walked the earth. Yet he was not awkward in all respects—Tom could talk; yes, Tom could talk splendidly; and after he had committed some glaring offence against the laws of good breeding, that caused even the most polite to smile, I used to think, "O, if you could only hear him talk, you would know him better."

He could talk, too, on all subjects—literature, science or metaphysics; he was at home in all. His awkwardness vanished when he spoke—no one thought of it; his form seemed to dilate, and his face to be perfectly radiant; and there was a grace and fascination about his conversation, too, that charmed one. I don't know whether it was the tones of his voice, which were full, deep and rich, or what it was, but such was the fact.

So we were settled at the widow Harrison's. We had a nice room, everything comfortable and pleasant about us; and Tom set himself down in good earnest to his studies, while I, less studious, seated myself at a window looking out into a pleasant flower garden. There I saw Miss Delia Harrison sitting in an arbor with a book in her hand. She looked very pretty; her auburn hair was smooth and soft, and arranged in the most approved fashion; she wore a loose, white morning robe, which flowing open, disclosed an elaborately wrought under-skirt, and from beneath this peeped a little foot in a Cinderella-like slipper. The hand that held her book was very white and delicate, and so of course was the other, which lay against her soft cheek.

"Tom," said I. He looked up from his book. "Have you looked into the flower garden?"

"Not this morning."

"Some new flowers have made their appearance."

"What are they?" asked he, in an absent manner.

"O, tulips, ladies' slippers, lilies and roses, all on one stalk."

"That is curious," said he, starting from his seat; for Tom was of a scientific turn, and always ready for new discoveries. With one long stride he reached the window. "Where?" said he.

"There in the arbor," said I.

Tom looked. "Pahaw," said he; and then added, laughingly: "A fine specimen, truly."

"How should you class it, Tom?"

He shook his head. "Magnificent, isn't she? What a hand! what a profile! what a complexion she has!"

Now I knew Tom was looking at and admiring her, just as one looks at and admires a new and exquisite flower; he wasn't one to fall in love with a pretty face and figure. Well, dinner-time came, and then we met our divinity of the garden, who presided at the table with infinite grace.

I have said before that Tom was awkward; he was peculiarly so at table; he never seemed to notice how other people conducted. He had a way of his own of doing everything, and it was as unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. He had no ready tact to accommodate himself to the company he was in; when he was with the Romans he never heeded what the Romans did, but preserved his individuality. Tom clung with tenacity to his old habits of eating with his knife and drinking out of his saucer, totally unaware that it was ungenteeled.

Indeed, eating and drinking was with him so little a matter of thought, he gave himself no concern about it other than to get over it as soon as possible. So in his own peculiar and awkward manner he seated himself at table with the fastidious Mrs. Harrison and her daughter. As it was plainly a matter of impossibility to eat soup with a knife, my friend took his spoon, and the first course passed off very well. Then came the roast, and Tom being very hungry ate away with a good relish, the odious knife making very expeditious trips from his plate to his mouth. I saw Mrs. Harrison look at her daughter, and I saw the daughter's blue eyes dilate, and her lip curl just a little scornfully; but my friend still kept on with his meal. I began to pity Tom, for I was afraid he would see the ladies were remarking his lack of good breeding ; but I might have saved myself the feeling ; he was as blind as a mole to any such thing—his thoughts were far different. Then came the pudding, and the knife having been removed by the servant, Tom accommodated himself to circumstances, and made the spoon answer all practical purposes.

Now the business of dinner was finished, and, leaning back in his chair, I saw that Tom was ready for a talk ; and as he always talked well after dinner, I hoped that he would retrieve himself in the eyes of the ladies. So with his own peculiar grace in conversation, so different from his awkwardness in everything else, he commenced, and at the first words that passed his lips, I saw he had attracted their attention ; the look of contempt passed away from the beautiful face of Delia, and her blue eyes sparkled with delight. Then she joined in the conversation, and I saw that Tom was interested and pleased with her remarks, and we had a very agreeable after dinner conversation.

So matters stood for some time, my friend daily offending the refined taste of the ladies by some staring breach of etiquette, and again fascinating them—or at least the younger—by his talents, his fine literary taste, and brilliant conversational powers. Tom was a lover of poetry and a very fine reader, and it was delightful to sit and listen to his fine musical voice ; and it would have been still more so could you have listened without seeing the awkward position he was sure to assume while reading.

The more I became acquainted with Delia Harrison the more I liked her. I found she was possessed of many excellent qualities ; she was amiable and warm-hearted ; but she had been brought up by her mistaken mother to attach too much importance to appearances, to forms and ceremonies. They were too superficial in their views of life and humanity.

Delia had a natural love for the beautiful and the graceful ; anything awkward offended her delicate tastes ; she allowed the forms and hollow shows of fashionable life to have too much weight with her, so that they fettered her fine mind, and blinded her mental vision to any good thing in those who were heedless of these forms and customs. So every day her taste rebelled against my poor friend on account of his awkwardness and disregard of etiquette, while her finely cultivated mind—and I began to think her heart, too—bowed down before his superior intellect.

Poor Mrs. Harrison became really alarmed, and I knew she heartily wished my friend and myself had never crossed her threshold. When Tom and Delia held long conversations, which they often did, or when he read to her some poem, if it was a possible thing for her to interrupt them without appearing actually impolite, she was sure to do so ; and I know she often spoke to her daughter in an exaggerating manner of poor Tom's awkwardness and ill-breeding.

Well, Tom and I pursued our studies—that is, we studied when we chose, and walked, and went fishing and shooting when so disposed. I argued it was best to enjoy ourselves while we could ; we should have to work hard enough by-and-by, when Tom was to enter at the bar, and I was to go—I didn't know exactly where. But I began to find about this time that I was often obliged to walk alone, or fish alone, or study alone ; for Tom was out gathering flowers in the woods with Delia, or else he was in the parlor reading aloud, or if he was in our room, he was more absent-minded than ever.

One evening I sat by my window smoking my cigar, and looking down into the flower garden. It was just growing dusk, though there was still light enough to distinguish figures, and I saw the outlines of two in the little arbor. There was no mistaking the awkward figure of my friend Tom, and the graceful one of Delia Harrison. He had been reading to her I supposed, and now they were talking upon some book or other. And I began upon this to think what a queer fellow Tom was ; and then it passed through my mind that if his graces of person only equalled those of his mind, what a splendid husband he would make for Delia Harrison. But as it is, she could never abide him. She is truly a splendid girl ; I don't know but I should have fallen in love with her myself had it not been for—but no, this has no connection with my story.

By-and-by Tom came in ; the room was quite dark now, so that I could not distinguish his features, but there was that in his step, or in the way he came in, which seemed to say that something unusual had happened. He didn't speak to me as usual, but went and stood by the other window, looking out.

"Tom," said I, "what were you and Miss Harrison talking of down in the arbor ?"

"I don't know what right you have to ask such a question."

I went up to him and put my hand on his shoulder.

"No right, Tom, at all ; and please forgive me ; I didn't mean to offend you or hurt your feelings."

He took my hand and pressed it hard.

"I have been a fool," said he. "I thought she might love me, and so—and so—I offered myself and she refused me."

"But can you imagine, Tom, what made her do it?"

"Why, she didn't love me, I suppose, and that was reason enough."

"But that is not the reason, Tom. I think she does love you."

"Does love me, and yet not accept my hand? You are mistaken, sir."

"Not at all. I am going to speak plainly to you. Delia Harrison is polished and elegant in her manners; her taste is refined and critical; the slightest breach of decorum or etiquette is in her sight a glaring fault. Now Thomas Stebbins is a fine man no doubt, but then he is not a polished gentleman; he often does things which offend the fastidious tastes of Mrs. Harrison and daughter; he is ignorant of the hundred and one rules of fashionable life; if Delia should drop her handkerchief, he would not think of picking it up. He is no lady's man; he often reads in company; has been seen to sit with his chair tipped back against the wall; many a time and oft has he eaten green peas with a knife; and when his coffee has been too hot has he poured it into a saucer. To be sure, he is learned and talented, and can talk well upon occasion; but not all his good qualifications can make up for his innumerable breaches of etiquette and offences against good taste. Now, my good friend, you may believe me or not, but this is the head and front of your offending. Would you only cultivate the graces, be a little more careful in your dress, and still more careful of your manners, believe me, there is no person Delia Harrison would like better for a husband than yourself."

Now I suppose this was the first intimation my friend had ever received that he was not perfectly passable in genteel society. A man's clothes, a man's manners, the way he should set at the table, what he should eat and how he should eat it, were among the last things thought of by the dear honest soul. He looked beneath or above all these. I don't believe he could have told, to have saved his life, the color of a single dress Miss Delia Harrison was in the habit of wearing; she was beautiful to him in all; he only thought of the mind and the soul; and as to the picking up of her handkerchief, or the helping her on with her shawl, I question whether he would have known one garment from the other. So it is not to be wondered at that when I ended my long speech he stood like one confounded. I had thought best to speak plainly upon the subject—it is my way so to do.

"What are you going to do, Tom?" said I, at last, as I found he had no idea of saying anything.

"I shall leave to-morrow."

"Where are you going?"

"Home."

"The best thing you can do, Tom."

Well, my friend started for home the next day. I pitied the poor fellow, and when he took leave of Delia I saw her cheek grew pale; but she stood it pretty well, and tried to smile and look unconcerned. But when poor Tom, in making his farewell bow, awkward even to the last, struck his foot against a chair, and came near falling at her feet, instead of smiling as once she would have done, she turned away her head, and I actually saw a tear in her eye.

I had no idea of leaving Mrs. Harrison's comfortable home just then, for I had not been jilted; and as I had engaged board till the autumn, I thought it best to stay. I had the gratification to see—and it was truly a gratification—that Miss Delia grew sad and thoughtful. And I saw, too, that Mrs. Harrison was relieved at Tom's departure.

"I think," said she, one day, at dinner, "you said your friend had gone home. Where is his native place?"

"In the State of New Hampshire."

"Ah," said she, "I judged he came from that part of the country. A very fine man he is, but not much used to society, I should judge." And she tossed back her head self-complacently, and adjusted her cap.

"You are mistaken, madam," said I. "Mr. Stebbins has been much in society, and in good society; but he is eccentric. Genius is allowed that privilege, Mrs. Harrison; no one thinks any the less of my friend for his few peculiarities."

"Ah, indeed," said she, somewhat mollified; the sentence sounded well to her. "Was he distinguished in college?"

"A better scholar never graduated than Thomas Stebbins. He is destined to shine in his profession. He has already gained himself a name and stands high in literary circles, where he is known and appreciated."

"What a pity," said she, "that he has not a little more polish!"

"Mama," said Delia, who was drinking in every word, "you forget you are talking to his most intimate friend."

"No, my dear," said she, "I speak not disparagingly; but certainly, any one can see that Mr. Stebbins lacks a certain grace and elegance that would sit well upon one of his mental attainments and culture."

"But," said I, "we ought not to expect everything in one poor human being. Some have the gift of making a handsome bow, some of dancing gracefully, some of singing well; some study etiquette, manners, and perfect themselves in those accomplishments; some are graceful naturally; there are others to whom nature seems to have been niggard of gifts of person, but she has given them instead graces of mind—she has given them souls beautiful and true, and powers and capacities of intellect above what she gives to common men; but she has linked them to physical developments far from prepossessing or graceful. To the ceremonies and conventionalities of life they pay no heed, and sensible, right-judging people see them as they are; the mighty soul, the mighty intellect find their true places among men, and are always appreciated, despite physical disadvantages. And such a man is my friend."

After delivering this most profound, philosophical disquisition, I left the mother and her daughter, and returned to my room. I knew this was presenting the subject in quite a new light—the eccentricities of genius was quite another thing, and sounded much better than a lack of refinement, a want of polish, or a shameful ignorance of the rules of good breeding.

I don't know how it was, but every day Delia and myself grew more intimate, and I began to see how it was possible for a poor fellow to get over head and ears in love with her before he knew it, that is if he were not protected by—but to my story. She was remarkably kind and gentle to me; we walked together, we sat together, and we talked together. I knew I could not begin to talk as well as Tom; but then, as the next best thing, I talked of him, and I think she was well satisfied.

Just about this time, when Delia and I were getting along so nicely, who should come along but a cousin of Delia's—a Clarence Herbert—a perfect gentleman, with splendid mustache and unexceptionable whiskers, pearly teeth, hands white and handsome, a faultless figure—a perfect love of a man, the pink of politeness, the soul of etiquette. How gracefully he sat at table; how well the silver fork became his white hands; how he waited upon the ladies, offering them this, and begging their acceptance of that; charming Mrs. Harrison, and throwing poor I quite into the shade. How he followed Delia, setting a chair whenever she seemed inclined to sit, and standing by her if she preferred to stand. How gracefully he turned the leaves of her music if she played the piano, and almost held her book for her when she read. He was her most devoted servant; he seemed willing to be her very slave. He was evidently used to the best society—one could see it in the cut of his coat, the swirl of his mustache, and the tie of his cravat; it was written on his patent leather boots, and the fact was wafted to your senses in every wave of his white cambric handkerchief. There was not a rule of etiquette he was not familiar with, not a problem of politeness he had not solved and extracted its very essence.

And this most polite and delectable specimen of humanity followed Delia like her very shadow; he was in love with her—or thought he was. Mrs. Harrison was pleased, but I sometimes saw a look in Delia's face more contemptuous than ever poor Tom's failings had called up, and more than once a sharp retort was on her lips at his unmeaning compliments, which was only checked by her nice sense of politeness.

Well, he offered himself at last, setting in the self-same arbor where poor Tom had made his first attempt at love-making. Sure, it was a fated place, for he was refused. Delia sought me and told me all about it; she had grown very sisterly and confiding of late.

"And why did you not accept him, Delia?" said I, mischievously. "Your mother likes him, and surely you could not find fault with him, for he is the most perfect gentleman, in appearance, I ever saw."

"Why," said she, "I didn't love him. Isn't that reason enough?" And she looked up in my face and smiled.

"The best reason in the world," said I. "I hope you always have as good a one when you refuse your lovers."

She looked down and blushed.

"I don't know," said she, hesitatingly. "The time has been when, perhaps, I should have accepted Clarence, and thought I loved him, and been contented as his wife; but that time has passed—I am wiser now." And her voice grew very sad.

"What has changed your mind?" said I.

"An acquaintance with nobler and better men, who live for something more than dress and show, and every day material life."

I looked at Delia, and I thought I never saw her look so lovely; and had it not been for that other face that came before me at the moment, I don't know but it might have been dangerous sitting so near her. I saw that the poor child was longing for somebody to whom she could open her heart, so I thought I would give her the opportunity.

"Delia," said I, "I am going to speak plainly to you. When you had the offer of a heart nobler and better, why did you cast it from you?"

It was a hard question. She covered her face with her hands. I was thinking only of Tom's happiness then.

"Say, Delia, you cast away a heart that loved you, a soul good and true, for a mere girlish prejudice, a weak, foolish pride; you saw and loved the good that was in him, and yet for a little roughness in the jewel, which love surely ought to overlook and soften, you cast it away."

She leaned her head on my shoulder, and said, "It is too true, Frank—too true."

"And now," said I, smoothing her soft hair with my hand and speaking very soothingly, "you are sorry; like a little child you weep for what you have carelessly thrown away; you would give worlds to have Thomas Stebbins speak the words he once spoke to you." She said nothing, but sobbed on. "Now do you expect, Delia—for he is a proud man—that he will offer you his heart the second time?"

"No, no! I am not deserving of this."

I pitied the poor girl as she thus wept; but by-and-by she lifted up her head, and as she smiled through her tears, her face became perfectly radiant.

"I am not often so foolish, Frank; but once in a while I yield thus and lament my own folly. But do not think me weak. I am trying to make myself better, to rid myself of foolish prejudices, so that if I should ever again meet your friend, he may see that I am not the poor weak creature I am afraid he now thinks I am." O, she didn't know what a high opinion he had of her!

That night I wrote a long letter to Tom, and I told him this conversation; and more than this, I told him to be sure and be at my boarding place as soon as possible, for I was going to leave, and must see him before my departure.

As I expected, Tom came—Delia, of course, knew nothing of his coming. As good luck would have it, Mrs. Harrison was away and would not be at home till late. Delia and myself were sitting in the parlor, when the bell rang, and in came Tom. He passed by the parlor and went up-stairs to my room. Delia knew his step, and she grew pale as death, and would have left the room, but I held her fast.

"It's only Tom. come to bid me good-by. I am going away to-morrow. Don't you want to see him once more?"

She trembled from head to foot, and tried to free her hand from my grasp, but I still held her fast. "Let me go," said she, faintly.

"Now, Delia," said I, "don't for a mere girlish weakness throw away a whole lifetime of happiness."

The color went and came, as hope and fear alternated in her heart. "He will think me so weak," said she.

"He thinks you are perfection."

"But he does not care for me now."

"He loves you yet, you foolish girl."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. Shall I call him?"

I still held her hand. She still hesitated, and Tom still waited up-stairs.

"Say, Delia, shall I call him?"

She gave me such a look with those blue eyes of hers I had a great mind to take her myself; but I resisted the temptation, and called out, "Tom! Tom!" And when I heard his foot upon the stairs, I led Delia back to her seat, and passing out, met Tom, and pressing his hand, wished him good luck, and went into my room to—pursue my studies!

I never heard any very correct report of that meeting. All I know is that it was very satisfactory to both parties; and when, the next day, Mrs. Harrison was told of Tom's sudden appearance and the consequences, she was quite astounded. However, she made the best of the matter, made due allowance for the eccentricities of genius, and found in time that she had really quite a respectable son-in-law.

Mr. Thomas Stebbins verified my prophecy concerning him. He rose to eminence in his profession, and was respected and beloved, and moved in the best society. Delia never repented of her choice; her fine taste imperceptibly softened and smoothed down his rough manner, and she found that he made a much better appearance as a husband than as a lover, and she never saw the day or moment she was not proud of him.

Delia and myself were always the best of friends. She says she has much to thank me for; for had it not been for me, she might never have been what she is—the Hon. Mrs. Thomas Stebbins.

ROYAL ETIQUETTE.

Louis XIII., desiring to hold a private council with his minister and master, Richelieu, was obliged to visit him in his bed-room, where he lay dangerously ill. But as a subject, though dying, could not be permitted to receive the king in bed, except the king was lying in bed also, Louis was wheeled in on a chaise longue, and they both thus lay in state to discuss the affairs of the nation. Louis XIV. observed the same form when he went to visit the wounded hero, Turenne. —N. Y. Mirror.

An Hibernian observing over a store door in New York, a sign, "General Finding Store," entered recently and inquired for a lost umbrella!

PROGRESS.

BY WM. RODERICK LAWRENCE.

He who looks cannot but see
 Progress stamped on every age;
 What the future race will be,
 Seem in vain fair history's page.

Let us boldly strive and win,
 Ours the work to plan and do;
 Till the nations gathered in,
 Claim the race and victory too.

Ever looking upward, higher,
 Nerve the soul for any strife;
 To the distant goal aspire,
 Ne'er give o'er while there is life.

Let us nobly strive to win,
 Nobly plan and nobly do;
 Till the harvest gathered in,
 Ours the crown and victory too.

THE SEASIDE IN SUMMER.

Talk of old ocean in the winter season, and it sends a shudder through your frame. It is well enough to sit by the cosy grate, or, what is better and healthier, though costlier, a blazing fire of oak and walnut, and read the romance of the "dark and deep blue ocean," but as for "going down to the sea in ships," in December and January, the idea is only to be entertained by a candidate for a lunatic asylum, or a business man, whose duty compels him to disregard the weather. But when the parching heats of summer come on, when the sun looks fiery down, when the sidewalks scorch your soles, when—even in the country—the brooks are dwindled to narrow threads of silver, and the corn looks drooping and yellow in the fields, and the foliage by the roadsides is dry and dusty, then memories of the great deep in its glory and beauty, and freshness and grandeur, crowd back on you with the force of a first love, and you are ready to rush into almost any spot where you are sure of meeting its cool embrace.

There is no monotony about old ocean. "From morn till dewy eve" its colors play through all the tones of the chromatic scale. It is alternately purple, azure gold, crimson and green. Even in the night, when the mists creep over the distant horizon, and the light houses come out like stars bursting on the firmament, one by one upon their rocky station points along a far extent of shores, all is not darkness in the waves that sink in music on the beach, or are shivered like glass upon the pointed rocks. A thousand phosphorescent stars, the seeming reflex of the firmament above, glitter in the surf. And then how grand, how tragic, is the deep in the roused fury of a summer storm; when the clouds press downwards in black battalions, and the crested waves, like plumed warriors, rise to do battle to the storm! How in the sudden uprising of the tempest, the white wings of the vessels in the offing suddenly disappear, as they take in sail to meet the startling emergency!

But in all these phases, we have but a distant acquaintance with the ocean, after all. To know it we must plunge into its heart—we must feel the exhilarating joy of the strong swimmer that lays his hand upon the tresses of the raging billows, as the lion-tamer strokes the mane of the lord of the desert. There is joy and health in thus sporting with the brine. Then the thought of moonlight rides along the sea beach, of hearing poetry recited by lips we love on the margin of the deep, with the running accompaniment of breaking ripples, like musical bells chiming into the melody of the verse—it is enough to make an editor forswear inkstand and desert his post.

But for the proper enjoyment of a fit of genuine laziness, commend us to a nook in the rocks, with a volume not too pleasant or engrossing, the shadow of a tall cliff over us, and a good lookout upon the broad expanse of ocean. What then to us is the strife—the angry passion of the fretting world! We find its type is the incessant war of wave and rock; and there is enough of excitement in that endless combat. How senseless to us seems the fierce pursuit of gold and of the "bubble reputation." We watch the white sails dipping and disappearing below the horizon, and imagination goes forth with them to tropic climes, to islands in the Pacific, to the haunts of the Nereides and the homes of the Fayaways. From such dreams, peopled with "creatures of the element," we go back to the routine of daily life refreshed and invigorated. No one is worse for a brief sojourn by the seaside in summer.

THE NORTHMEN AT MONHEGAN.

We some weeks since noticed the fact that Dr. Hamlin, of this city, who visited the island of Monhegan in quest of curious figures said to exist upon rocks there, was successful in his investigation. He took casts of the inscriptions in plaster from the face of the ledge in which they appear. Fac-similes of these casts will be sent to the Archaeological Society at Copenhagen. Drawings of the same have also been sent to Rev. Dr. Jenks, a distinguished antiquarian of Boston, by whom they were at once recognized as Runic characters, but their translation will have to come from the Copenhagen Society, which possesses the means to give it.—Bangor Journal.

Time is the only commodity or gift, of which every man that lives has an equal share.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

CONVERSATION.

There are very few good talkers, though there are plenty of orators in the world. When a man is a good talker, neither too deep, too prolix, too witty, too humorous or too grave in his conversation, he achieves a lasting reputation—like Sydney Smith, or Theodore Hook, or Samuel Rogers. Yet there is more in the manner, the tone and the expression of face of a good talker, than in his matter. When we read any of Rogers's sayings, we are surprised at the impression he made. An anonymous writer has said, It would appear that to a thoroughly good talker something is required of the talents of active life. Lord Bacon, Selden, Cicero, Burke, were all men of action. Napoleon said things which tell in history like his battles. Luther's table-talk glows with the fire which burnt the pope's bull. Nearly all great orators have been excellent in colloquy, and—which is a kindred fact—a very large proportion of actors likewise. If we take the conversational men of letters, we shall find that they were either men fit for action, but kept out of it by accident, like Dr. Johnson, or at once men of letters and men of action, like Swift. If we take the conversational poets, we shall find them among those nearest to men of action in their natures, like Byron, and Burns, and Scott. The best sayers of good things have been among statesmen, diplomatists, and men of the world. In short, we think the essence of the quality lies as much in the character as in the intellect. It is an affair of the emotions, of the animal spirits, as well as of mental gifts.

La Bruyere said the art of conversation consists much less in your abundance than in enabling others to find talk for themselves. Men do not wish to admire you: they want to please. And so Lord Bacon—The honorablest part of talk is to give the occasion. Another writer—we believe Hazlitt—said that "talk all wit would be as disagreeably monotonous as a dinner all champagne. When a man is always witty, it is a proof that he has no other quality equally conspicuous, and the person who is spoken of as par excellence 'a wit,' is a second-rate conversationalist. 'He was so well drest,' said somebody to Brummell, 'that people would turn and look at him.' 'Then he was not well drest, replied the great master of the art.' We venture to apply the doctrine to table-talk. It should not want wit; but it should not exceed in it; the epigram should be sprinkled over it with the natural grace of daisies on a meadow." Certainly, if there are few good talkers, it is not for want of rules and illustrations. But the art of conversation is, we fancy, after all, a sort of special gift. There are many men who, do their best, will never make good talkers.

SHERIDAN'S FORGIVENESS.

Sheridan once said in company that he never harbored resentment. Speaking of a person who had published a pamphlet against him, "I suppose Mr. A. thinks I am angry with him, but he is mistaken, for I never harbor resentment. If his punishment depended on me, I would show him that I can rise superior to all vindictive feelings. Far should I be from wishing to inflict capital punishment upon him, grounded on his attack on me. No, gentlemen; yet, on account of his general character and conduct, and as a warning to others, I would merely order him to be publicly whipped three times, to be set in the pillory four times, to be confined in prison seven years, and then, as he would enjoy freedom the more after so long a confinement, I would have him transported for life."

CURE FOR DESPONDENCY.—Set about doing good for somebody; put on your hat and visit the poor; inquire into their wants and relieve them; seek out the desolate and oppressed, and tell them of the consolations of religion.

SLANDER.—It is a poor soul that cannot bear slander. No decent man can get along without it—at least, none that are actively engaged in the struggle of business life.

ROMANTIC.—Dickens has purchased a cottage of Queen Anne's time, near London. The rising ground on which this cottage lifts its head is Gads-hill, famed by Shakespeare as the haunt of Falstaff.

SAYE.—Buffon said that to every goose hatched there were twenty hands ready to pluck it—or if he didn't say it, he ought to have said so.

RETOURTS ON LAWYERS.

Lawyers generally have it all their own way when they are browbeating witnesses—an amusement with which the court very rarely interferes. Sometimes, however, they get as good as they send, when they happen to "wake up the wrong passenger." In the traditions of the English bar, some of these hits are preserved, though they may not be found "in the books." Sergeant Cockle, who was a rough, blustering fellow, once got from a witness more than he gave. In a trial of a right to a fishery he asked the witness, "Do you like fish?" "Ay," replied the witness, with a grin; "but I don't like cockle sauce with it." The roar of laughter which echoed through the court rather disturbed the learned sergeant. A somewhat similar anecdote is related of Sergeant Davy, a great lawyer of the last age. A gentleman once appeared in the Court of King's Bench to give bail in the sum of £3000. Sergeant Davy, wanting to display his wit, said to him, sternly: "And pray, sir, how do you make out that you are worth three thousand pounds?" The gentleman stated the particulars of his property up to £3940. "That's all very good," said the sergeant; "but you want sixty pounds more to be worth three thousand." "For that sum," replied the gentleman, in no way disconcerted, "I have a note of hand of one Mr. Sergeant Davy, and I hope he will have the honesty to settle it soon." The laughter that this reply excited extended even to the bench; the sergeant looked abashed, and Lord Mansfield observed, in his usual urbane tone, "Well, brother Davy, I think we may accept bail." Every one remembers how the barrister got bothered in seeking to confuse a clownish witness from Yorkshire.

"Haven't I seen you somewhere?" said he.

"Very likely," was the reply; "I often go there."

"Answer me one question, sir," said the lawyer, sternly. "Are there as many fools as ever in the West Riding?"

"No, sir," replied the witness, promptly. "We have enough on 'em—but not so many as when you were there!"

Dr. Brodum, a notorious quack, was once under examination by Mr. Abraham Moore. "Your name is Brodum, I believe?" inquired the counsel. The doctor nodded assent. "Pray, how do you spell it—Brodum or Broad-hum?" On this there was a loud laugh in court, which was not diminished when the quack replied, with admirable self-possession: "Why, sir, as I am but a doctor, I spell my name Bro-dum; but if I were a barrister, I should spell it Broad-Hum?"

Dunning, while examining a witness, asked him if he didn't live at the very verge of the court. "Yes, I do," was the reply.

"And pray, why have you selected such a spot for your residence?"

"In the vain hope of escaping the rascally impertinence of dunning," was the retort.

A witness with a Bardolphian nose coming in Dunning's way, he said to him, "Now, Mr. Copper-nose, you have been sworn; what do you say?" "Why, upon my oath," replied the witness, "I would not exchange my copper nose for your brassen face!"

A MONSTER GUN.

A tremendous piece of ordnance in the shape of an iron gun has just been completed at Liverpool, the forging being done by Messrs. Horsfall. In the first place, slabs of iron were welded together until a solid lump was formed, weighing about twenty-six tons. Forty men were at times employed upon it, and the forging hammer used weighed nine tons. After being roughly shaped, it was bored, and the metal was found to be perfect, exhibiting no brittleness or imperfection. The net weight of the gun, when completed, was found to be 21 tons, 18 cwt. Its diameter at the muzzle is 27 inches. With a charge of ninety pounds of powder it is expected to throw a ball of 301 pounds weight a distance of five miles. The Pacha of Egypt being desirous of procuring one of these pretty but dangerous playthings, has been informed by the manufacturers that they will make him one cheap—that is to say for $24,000. If he gets it, it will ruin him in powder. What a gun that would be for Fourth of July salutes! It must "speak loud," as the boys say. In the elegant phraseology of the day, it must needs be a "stanner."

APPROPRIATE.—One of the French ministers of war under the Bourbons was named Tonnerre—meaning thunder; a significant appellation for such an official.

STAGE DANCERS.—There are no more irascible people than stage dancers, and they have often occasioned trouble. Their hops brew mischief.

A QUERY.—Does the world go forward, or move in a circle so large that it seems a straight line?

CAUTION.—If we all had windows in our breasts we should take care to keep the blinds shut.

A FINISHED GENTLEMAN.—One who has fallen in a duel.

FACING THE MUSIC.

There is no quality the world admires so much, applausé so much, and rewards so richly, as courage; and when a man is ready, in our popular phrase, to "face the music,"—that is to meet any emergency, moral or physical, with resolution—there is scarcely any honor in the gift of his fellow-citizens to which he may not aspire. It was the rare combination of the different kinds of courage which finally crowned the career of Gen. Jackson with complete success through the severest trials of political opposition. To few men is it given to unite all the attributes of courage, and to face moral responsibilities with the same equanimity as physical dangers. Nay, a man may even be brave in one sort of physical danger and timid in another. Frederick of Prussia could face a battery, but was afraid to snuff a candle with his fingers. Many a naval hero, who has trod the gun-deck fearlessly amid the roar of battle, has trembled like a leaf when put astride a horse. One of Napoleon's bravest marshals was so frightened at the idea of going up the side ladder of a frigate, that he had to be hoisted through a port-hole by a rope. More than one soldier who has led a charge upon the battlefield, has entirely broken down in an attempt to address a popular assembly.

One of the finest exhibitions of true, calm courage on record was that of Louis Philippe, King of the French, on the 22d of July, 1835—the fifth anniversary of that revolution which had placed him on the throne. On that day he had determined, accompanied by his splendid staff, and surrounded by his three sons, Nemours, Orleans and De Joinville, to review the National Guard and the regular troops. All business was suspended—all Paris was in the streets. It seemed one vast camp. Wherever the eye glanced banners waved in the sunny air, and the tall stone buildings gave back continually the stormy roll of hundreds of drums and the blare of hundreds of trumpets. The boulevards, from the Place de la Bastille to the farthest extremity of the Champs Elysees, were lined on both sides with National Guards and regular troops, cavalry, infantry, and municipal authorities. The king, with his sons riding beside him, and surrounded by nearly all the general officers of France, rode along between hedges of bayonets, polished like mirrors. Every window was crowded with spectators, as well as the balconies, the roofs, the very chimneys. Shouts of applause welcomed the monarch at every point; for he was still in the height of his popularity. All at once, as the glittering group entered on the Boulevard of the Temple, an awful explosion was heard, and in an instant the pavement at the king's feet was drenched with blood and strewn with the dead and dying—the assassin Fieschi had fired his infernal machine.

The king was on that occasion "every inch a king." He raised his hat to show that he was unhurt and to dispel the fears of the people. He next sent an equestrian to the queen to announce the safety of her husband and sons. Then, though tears gushed from his eyes at the sight of his slaughtered and mutilated friends, at Mortier, an illustration of the empire, lying dead before him, he gave the order to move on. It was a gallant and glorious effort that by which he mastered his feelings. He continued his march and went through with the review, leaving faction no opportunity of triumphing over a single moment's weakness. It was by such acts of dauntless courage that he retained his position eighteen years. What a pity that the lustre of his character was dimmed by grave mistakes, and that he could not have remembered that he held the throne in trust for his people, and not for the advancement of his family!

NAVAL NOMENCLATURE.—Since the last war, ships in the United States navy are named after States; frigates after American rivers sloops of war after State capitals and other cities; brigs after some noted deceased naval commander; and revenue cutters after members of the cabinets. Collins steamers are named after oceans and seas, and the Cunarders after countries.

CURIOUS SUPERSTITION.—The fishers of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, have a singular dread of being counted, of which the mischievous boys of Aberdeen were wont to avail themselves by crying, as the fisherwomen passed:

"One, two, three,
What a lot of fisher-nannies I see."

PROMOTION.—Seventeen private soldiers in the French army, during Napoleon's time, raised themselves to the following distinguished stations: Two became kings; two, princes; nine, dukes; two, field marshals, and two, generals.

A GOOD TOAST.—The Ladies—The only enduring aristocracy who rule without laws, judge without jury, decide without appeal, and are never in the wrong.

QUAKERS IN THE UNITED STATES.—There are at the present time in this country 716 churches belonging to the Quakers, and the number of attendants is estimated at 283,000.

TRAITS OF MENDICITY.

We remember very well reading an anecdote of a sturdy beggar which if not true was quite good enough to be true. A supplicant for charity took a gentleman aside in the lower mall, showed him flaunting rags and hollow cheeks, and begged him to give him something to enable him to purchase a mouthful to eat. The gentleman handed him a three-cent piece, which happened to be all the change he had about him.

"What, sir!" exclaimed the mendicant, with great animation, "is this for me?"

"Certainly—take it," said the dispenser of charity, endeavoring to hurry away.

"No, sir," rejoined the beggar, drawing himself up with all the dignity of Edie Ochiltree in the Antiquary. "Take back your money, sir."

"I thought you asked me for money."

"So I did, sir," said the beggar. "I asked you for charity. But three cents! A paltry three-cent piece! What can I do with such a sum as that?"

"Keep it and give it to some poor person," was the sharp retort.

But in the tricks of the trade of beggary, it must be confessed that foreign beggars beat us all hollow, and of foreign beggars, that those of Paris lead the entire world in ingenuity, impudence and mendacity. St. Giles can't hold a candle to them. One of the very latest dodges is the farce of debtor and creditor. It is performed after this fashion:

A man with an honest countenance, dressed as becomes respectable penury, with a threadbare suit, and shiny, napless hat, is accosted in the street by an individual of commonplace appearance and brutal manners, who demands, with a gruff voice and ruffianly air, the payment of a certain amount of money owing to him. The passers-by become curious, and the idle gather round. The creditor talks louder; the debtor casts down his eyes and stammers. He is confused and despairing, and implores his rude persecutor to spare him this public humiliation. But it seems that the wildness and misery of the debtor only increase the rudeness and ferocity of the creditor. He heaps insult upon insult, and finally seizes the unhappy man by the collar. The wretched debtor lifts his eyes to heaven, and tears, genuine tears, are seen to dim their lustre. The crowd naturally takes his part—multitudes always sympathize with distress,—but the creditor stands upon his rights, like Shylock.

"It's no use to talk, gentlemen. He shall pay me, or I'll know the reason why. I'll drag him before a public commissioner in spite of his whinings."

Violent murmurs now rise on every side; the pity of the spectators is at its height, and sometimes a rich and benevolent person in the crowd produces the amount claimed—which is never more than about twenty francs—and gives them to the pitiless creditor. If this generous financier is not to be found, a confederate proposes a general contribution, setting the example, and the money comes down in a shower. Instead of the twenty francs demanded, he gets thirty or forty. The creditor is paid, the debtor freed, and the trick succeeds, the whole crowd having been handsomely "sold" by this ingenious application of the principle of confederacy.

PRIVATEERING.

Talking about a war with England, privateering, Yankee daring, and matters of that sort, the other day, a friend of ours from the good old town of Plymouth, related the following as a matter-of-fact: A ship carpenter, by the name of Darrel, during the second war with Great Britain, enlisted on board a little privateer brig, called the Vengeance, 180 tons, and mounting only six light pieces. Darrel took the lead among his messmates from his utter fearlessness and recklessness. They cruised off the Banks, and were on the lookout for a British merchantman, laden with silks and brandy. One morning they saw her looming through the fog, and bore down on her, ready to board and capture her, when, as they came near, she suddenly yawed round, her starboard ports flew open, and she showed by her teeth and her colors that she was a British man-of-war. The privateer had the American ensign at her peak, so that each party knew the other. A council of war was instantly held on board the Vengeance, and Darrel's opinion first asked. "Fight her of course," was the reply, and notwithstanding the imminence of the danger there was a roar of laughter at the perfect gravity and good faith with which the reckless advice was given. "Of course" there was no fighting, but an immediate surrender, as the only means of escape from destruction. The prisoners were speedily released, however, for peace had been declared, but "Fight her of course" stuck to Jack Darrel as long as he lived.

SENSIBLE.—"This is what they call a fellow-feeling for a man," said a loafer, as a watchman was groping for him in the dark.

A WISE MAXIM.—The Prussians say, whatever you would have appear in a nation's life, you must put in its schools.

ONE IDEA.

It is just as bad to cling to one idea as to use only one kind of exercise: no man can hope for a well-balanced mind without it is a many-sided one. The mind is so nicely balanced that, unless all its parts are kept in motion, are properly exercised and properly employed, the whole fabric becomes disordered and paralyzed. Nearly all lunatics are monomaniacs. No man ought to have only one hobby-horse—he should have a whole steed of them and ride them by turns, unless he wishes his racing-jacket to be changed into a straight-jacket. A love of horses, for instance, is not incompatible with a love of loftier things; Alfieri was passionately fond of them. But there is all the difference in the world between Alfieri, the poet and lover of liberty, and young Noodle, who almost lives in the stable, and talks nothing but horse, morning, noon and night. Noodle estimates a man, not by his moral and intellectual qualities, but by his weight. Is he light enough to back a three-year old? Would he do to ride the bay filly for the thousand-dollar stake? Put him on the box of a stage-coach with the "lines" in his hand, and he is as happy as a king upon his throne—much happier, if all tales told out of school be true.

Noodle's friend, Jinkins, is another monomaniac, with a different crotchet in his head, or "bee in his bonnet," as the Scotch say. The military is his hobby. He walks, or rather marches, as if he had a drill sergeant before him. He asks you, when he meets you, if you know how many buttons there are on the sleeve of the new regulation uniform, and if you can't answer him, pities your ignorance from the bottom of his heart. Then there is the nautical monomaniac.

"The sun was white and red the morn
The noisy hour that he was born;
The whale it whistled, the porpoise railed,
And the dolphin bared his scales of gold;
And never was heard such an uproar wild
As welcomed to earth the ocean child."

He dresses in a blue jacket and white pants, chews tobacco voraciously, and frequently refers to his "top-lights" in a very mysterious manner. He sneers malignantly at "land lubbers," and, like Long Tom Coffin, "can't see the use of having any land, except to hold an anchor-fluke or raise a few vegetables and potatoes." But this hapless monomaniac was never afloat—not he. He is a sailor only in imagination. He once went to Nahant by steamboat, but was so awfully sick that he has patronized the railroad ever since. Yet he is the victim of one idea—"the sea, the sea, the open, open sea." The prize-ring, the stage, politics, have all their representative men of one idea; and the worst lack we can conceive of is to be compelled to listen to one of these individuals for an hour as he chants the praises of his favorite hobby, and fairly "runs the thing into the ground."

INGRATITUDE.

One of the most striking instances of ingratitude—in this case it was the result of avarice—that we ever met with is related by Dr. King, in his "Anecdotes of his own Times." Sir William Smythe, of Bedfordshire, was his kinsman. When he was nearly twenty, he was persuaded to be couched by Taylor, the famous oculist, on an agreement that the operator should receive sixty guineas if he succeeded in restoring his patient to any degree of sight. Taylor accomplished his task, and Sir William was able to read and write without spectacles for the remainder of his life. But no sooner had the operation been performed, and Sir William seen the good effects of it, than, instead of being overjoyed as most people would have been, he began to lament the loss (as he called it) of his sixty guineas. His contrivance, therefore, was now to cheat the oculist. He pretended he could not see anything perfectly, and for that reason the bandage was continued on a month longer than the usual time. By this means, he obliged Taylor to compound the bargain and accept of twenty guineas; for a covetous man thinks no method dishonest which he may legally practise to save his money. In our opinion, Sir William Smythe, baronet, of Bedfordshire, was an unmitigated rascal.

ALGERIA.—Twelve hundred tribes now acknowledge the French authority in Algeria. Louis Napoleon talks of erecting it into a kingdom: so that if he should be obliged to walk out of the Tuileries some fine day he will have a place of refuge to go to. Nobody will think of "carrying the war into Africa."

POPULATION AND BIBLES.—The population of the United States is now over 25,000,000, making nearly 6,000,000 families; of these, it is believed more than 1,000,000 are without the Bible.

DON'T BE AFRAID.—As an old woman was lately walking through one of the streets of Paris at midnight, a patrol called out, "Who's there?" "It is I, patrol! don't be afraid!"

MUSIC FOR THE MILLION.—A writer in the New York Tribune states that 4382 hand organs are daily ground in the streets of that city.

STRONG PRACTICE.

We remember hearing a self-educated healer of the sick, who hung out his shingle in a certain town of Louisiana, give an account of his practice with a coolness that made us shudder: "Stranger," said he, "the wust fever we hev here is the onremittin'. It's purty tight—'cause it's apt to hang on long, but it aint nothin' like ekal to that die-gestive fever that they dies on over in them Mills. I, in general, mostly uses it up in a couple of days. I gin a 'mettick in the fust place; then, half an hour after that, five or ten grains of 'Samson,'—that's the short name we hev here for calumny. Wall, then when the case looks right, I give about a wine-glassful of ile—and the next day the nigger is fitten for que-nine, and the day after he can walk into the pork and make the hoe fly. It's seldom I has 'em in longer than I tells you on. Sometimes, in the very beginning of the attack, I bleeds 'em; but it wont do, stranger. When the eyes look big and glassy, old Samson in five grain doses, in every half an hour, fur about five hours, is jest the thing—they is more people killed by bleedin' at the wrong time, than they is by Old Death himself!"

A FOOL'S ANSWER.—One of the learned professors, rambling in the vicinity, encountered a simpleton, not a "motley fool," however, to whom he propounded the following question: "How long can a man live without brains?" "I don't know," drawled the suburban, scratching his head. "How long have you lived yourself, sir?" No more questions were asked.

THE VERY BEST.—Perhaps the very best pun on record was that made by the Marquis de Bievre. Louis XVI. asked him for a specimen of his wit. "Give me a subject," said the punster. "Take me," said the monarch. "Pardon, your majesty—a king is no subject."

RELIGION IN FRANCE.—It appears from official returns that the number of persons in France belonging to the Roman Catholic religion is 35,931,032; Calvinists, 480,607; Lutherans, 267,826; Jews, 73,975; other creeds, 30,000.

ASTONISHING.—It is a singular fact that women, after a certain age, never grow older, but often younger. It is next to impossible for unmarried women to get over forty.

A BRIGHT HOPE.—Mrs. Hope, an American lady, lately wore at a London party a diamond bracelet that cost $75,000.

HELP.

Some housekeepers complain that it is a bitter satire to call domestics in this country "help." We dare say that when Mrs. Col. Freemont did her own housework in California, she got along a great deal better than she has done since with servants to oversee. An English nobleman once had a French valet reply in person to his advertisement for a servant. The applicant produced his credentials, and enlarged on his accomplishments. He was then asked what his terms were. "Three hundred pounds a year," answered the valet. "Zounds! fellow," exclaimed his lordship; "make it guineas, and I'll wait on you!" A nobleman once found Fontenelle in very bad humor. "What is the matter with you?" he asked. "The matter!" replied Fontenelle; "I have but one domestic, and I am as badly served as if I had twenty!"

SUCCESS OF THE MAGAZINE.—We should be wanting in feeling not to acknowledge with thanks the vast patronage which is being extended to BALLOU'S DOLLAR MAGAZINE. We have placed our mark at one hundred thousand for its circulation at the close of the present year, and we are fast approaching that number. This is unprecedented, and shows that its excellence and cheapness are being understood far and near.

NEVER HEARD OF HIM.—A regimental chaplain, in preaching to his military auditors, spoke of the general deluge. "Who's he?" whispered a soldier, nudging his comrade. "I thought I knew all the great commanders of Europe, but I never heard of General Deluge."

A GOOD DAUGHTER.—A good daughter! There are other ministers of love more conspicuous than her, but none in which a gentler, lovelier spirit swells, and none to which the heart's warm requitals more joyfully respond.

METALLIC ALLOY.—A London artist has secured a patent for a new alloy of metal, composed of copper, zinc and magnesia, which bears a strong resemblance to gold in several respects.

A QUESTION.—We often hear of a man "being in advance of his age," but who ever heard of a woman being in the same predicament?

A HIT.—Peter Pindar it was who said that the booksellers drank their wine in the manner of the heroes in the Hall of Odin, out of authors' skulls.

Foreign Miscellany.

The potato crop has proved a complete failure throughout Portugal.

Baron James de Rothschild has given forty thousand francs to the sufferers by the late inundations in France.

The increase of government expenditure in Great Britain during the two years of the recent Russian war was £53,688,000.

There are now no less than three hundred and sixty-four churches in Rome, while the population is considerably less than two hundred thousand.

It is said to be the intention of the Russian government to establish a journal in London similar to the "Nord" of Brussels.

Sir George Grey, governor of the Cape of Good Hope, strongly recommends the encouragement of immigration.

M. Mazzini announces his intention of withdrawing altogether from politics, and emigrating as a private citizen to the United States.

Some searching mind has discovered that the city of Paris consumes daily some two billion cups of coffee!

Munich has decreed that the graves of Sennefelder, the inventor of lithography, and Gabelberger, the inventor of stenography, shall henceforth be carefully kept.

The pianos annually manufactured in France are worth 40,000,000 francs. "France plays," said M. Veron recently in the Corps Legislatif, "while the rest of Europe dances."

The present year completes the first century of the existence of the Swedenborgian doctrine. A great commemorative gathering is to be held in London, in June of next year.

It is proposed to add the £20,000 remaining of the large sum voted for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington, to the £5000 appropriated for a monument, and erect another colossal one to the hero of Waterloo.

Up to the 10th of May, 55,000 French, 9000 English, 7000 Sardinians, and 10,000 Turks had quitted the Crimea; and there were still on Russian territory 25,000 French, 40,000 English, and 9000 Sardinians.

The emigration from Norway to the United States is very considerable this year, and the emigration fever in some parts of the country is so great that the value of property has fallen considerably.

A flute made of gold is on exhibition in London. The gold was brought from Australia. The weight of the flute is 14 1/2 ounces, the value being estimated at about $650. The workmanship is exquisite.

The locomotives in Germany are hereafter to be covered with a casing of glass, which will permit the engineers to survey the whole country, and at the same time protect them from the wind and cold.

The steeple chase on the Prater at Vienna was a dead failure. A trough had been laid across the road so as to represent a river, but the horses, instead of clearing it, drew up, and began in the coolest manner to drink out of it!

The new ship building at Millwall, Eng., is an eighth of a mile long.

Louis Napoleon is proposing to establish an order of Algerian nobility.

A census just taken in Greece shows the population to be 1,043,153.

Austria is contented with the future intentions of France and England toward Italy.

Collections continue in England for sufferers in France by the inundation.

The fountains of Sydenham Palace have been opened. They excel those of Versailles.

Sir Edward Lyons is to be raised to the peerage for services in the Black Sea, being the only peerage manufactured from this war.

Gen. Williams, the brave defender of Kara, upon his arrival in England, was the recipient of many complimentary demonstrations.

The streets of London extend in length 1730 miles, the paving of which cost £44,000,000, and the yearly cost of keeping the pavement in repair amounts to £1,800,000.

The trustees of the British Museum have recommended to the Lords of the Treasury that a grant of £5000 should be made for decorating the interior of the new reading room.

A subterranean railroad is now being laid down in Paris, in the middle of the Boulevard du Sebastopol. It will connect the halles or markets with the extramural railways.

The English Royal Yacht Club, which is only one of many such, numbers 173 members. They own 91 yachts, measuring rather more than 11,000 tons, which gives an average of not less than 120 tons as the measurement of each.

Rossini has received an ovation at Strasburg in Germany. All the performers of the theatre, recruited by a number of musicians, assembled under his windows by torchlight, and gave him a serenade.

The disease is again prevalent in the wine districts of Portugal. The potato crop is a failure, and there will not be half a harvest; so that large imports from the United States and from England are looked for.

An expedition is fitting out at Hamburg by a Russian American company, to sail shortly for Russo-American territory. The expedition is of the nature of a new colony, numbering five hundred persons, including artificers of all kinds.

The baneful ribbon system is prevailing extensively on the northwestern counties of Ireland, especially in Donegal and Sligo. Owing to instructions from government, the constabulary are making great exertions to break up the confederacy.

The Austrian party at Rome, which is already more powerful than the French, is daily increasing in strength; but Pius IX. himself has as strong a dislike to the German element as he had when he first seated himself in the chair of St. Peter.

The Dublin Nation announces that Mr. Charles Gavan Duffy, the late proprietor of that paper, is to receive a present of £10,000 in Australia, for the purpose of giving him a qualification to enter the Legislature.

Record of the Times.

Col. Samuel Colt (of revolver fame) recently married Miss Elizabeth Jarvis, of Middletown.

Actors should remember that applause is often elicited by their words, not themselves.

The most inconsiderable men are usually of the most eminent gravity.

The public libraries of New York city contain 36,290 volumes.

The town of Dunee, Scotland, with 4000 people, has no public house.

Mazzini, the Italian patriot, intends to emigrate as a private citizen to this country.

A second Calvin Edson has appeared in New York. He is five feet six inches in height, and only weighs fifty pounds.

At the late annual meeting of the New York Association, two new churches, one French and the other German, were received.

Le Verrier, director of the Observatory at Paris, has named the last new planet, the fortieth of the series discovered by M. Goldschmidt, "Harmonia," in honor of the conclusion of peace.

Rev. Archibald Maclay, D. D. having resigned the presidency of the American Bible Union, Rev. T. Armitage, D. D., has been elected his successor.

The Russian Government is having considerable quantities of silver, which it has bought up in England and Germany, melted down into bars at the Frankfort Mint.

The pig population—four-legged—of the Mississippi Valley is estimated at between forty and fifty millions—nearly two pigs apiece for every human being in the United States!

Charles F. M. Garrett, of Richmond, Va., now chief engineer of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, has received the appointment of chief engineer of the Don Pedro Railroad, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, with a salary of $15,000.

The editor of the Perth (C. W.) Standard states that those fashionable and airy articles of ladies' underclothing, hooped skirts, are now being used by female Canadian thieves for the purpose of concealing stolen property.

There is now scarcely a single State in the Union but what has an asylum for the insane, and some of the States have several. Even in California, a large and expensive hospital has been erected for the insane, as one of the first objects of attention in that State.

The editor of the New Lisbon (Ohio) Aurora gives as one reason for the non-appearance of that journal in twenty-three days, his working in the garden and lifting (though not all at once) more than fifty tons of ground, and another, that his assistant type-setter has got married and gone West.

The British Government, it is said, lately made large contracts for Sharpe's rifles with some of our manufacturers, and the manufacture of them by American mechanics at Edgefield, England, is now being carried on under a tremendous press of steam, to supply the army as soon as possible.

The number of Germans or their descendants in the United States is rated at four millions.

Mr. Samuel Watkins has given the city of Nashville ten acres of land for a park.

John Adams's father said, "I couldn't make him a shoemaker, so put him to learning!"

A teaspoonful of mustard, mixed with warm water, is an antidote for poison.

In raising grapes, always preserve three or four leaves beyond each bunch.

If you must find fault, do it in private, if possible, and briefly.

Some of the Mormons are said to be on their way to the Eastern States for machinery for a steamboat, to be used on Salt Lake.

The application of towels, wrung out in hot water, to the forehead and temples, is represented to be an efficacious and speedy remedy for headaches arising from neuralgic affections.

In the tenth century, to eat out the same plate, and drink out the same cup, was considered a mark of gallantry and the best possible understanding between a lady and gentleman.

Miss Lake, an energetic lady, is now on a visit to Philadelphia, with the object of collecting funds to establish a Female Seminary in the island of Hayti.

The loss by fire in the United States for the last six months is set at $8,782,000—not including any fires by which the loss was less than $10,000!

There is a man in the New Jersey Penitentiary who has had twenty-three wives, two of whom he married within two hours of each other.

During the month of May last, two thousand six hundred French Canadians had left Montreal for the United States, whither they go for employment, and with the intention of becoming citizens.

All the towns in Minnesota are crowded with emigrants. Boarding and provisions are high in consequence. Since the spring opened, the emigration to the territory has not fallen short of one thousand persons a day.

It is reported that the Rothschilds, of London and Paris, have entered the sugar market. By purchasing supplies when everything could be had cheapest, whether in Havana, Brazil, East Indies or elsewhere, they would be enabled, on an advance in prices, to realize large profits.

The ocean, according to geographers, is contained in five great basins—not mere "nutshells." They are rather sizable dishes which hold the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Arctic, and the Antarctic Oceans! We may add that they are all earthen basins, and that the Eastern is contained in a China one!

The voluntary contributions of the people of the United States to religious and benevolent institutions are among the most gratifying evidences of modern enlightenment. The receipts of nineteen of the great Christian organizations for the year ending in April last, were $1,840,823 48, being an increase of $207,943 87 upon the receipts of the previous year.

Merry Making.

Many literary "effusions" proceed from water on the brain.

Why was the nose put in the middle of the face? Because it's the scenter (centre).

Why is an awkward fellow like a pine tree? Because he is evergreen.

So many people "cut a dash" with money that it is highly incorrect to call it "blunt."

What sort of trees will best bear removal and transportation? Axle-trees.

"Papa, have guns got legs?" "No." "How do they kick, then?" "With their breeches, my son."

What animal has the greatest quantity of brains? The hog, of course, for he has a hog-head full.

"Massa, one ob your oxen's dead—todder too—was 'fraid to tell you ob 'em bof at once, 'fraid you couldn't bore it."

What Scripture character would you mention in ordering away an untruthful person. Ans.—Goliath. (go liar.)

Did you ever buy a horse? If so, you have doubtless been struck with surprise at the very great number of horses just seven years old.

"I am afraid you will come to want," said an old lady to her daughter. "I have come to want already," was the reply; "I want a nice young man."

One of our exchanges has the audacity to say that French stocks rose considerably upon the birth of "that blessed baby," and were decidedly boy-ant.

Mrs. Fly was asked if she kneaded her dough, or beat it up with a stick. "If you can find anybody that 'needs the dough' more than I do," said she, "pity take mercy on 'em!"

The largest angel we ever read of was seen by Mahomet in the third heaven, which the Koran says had two eyes seventy thousand days' journey apart.

The Hopeful Son.—Mother.—Did I not tell you not to trouble those pies again? Hopeful Son.—I aint had no trouble with 'em; I'm a eaten 'em as peaceable as can be.

Chesterfield having been informed by his physician that he was dying by inches, congratulated himself that he was not so tall as Sir Thomas Robinson!

"Well, Pat, which is the way to Burlington?" "How did you know my name was Pat?" "O, I guessed it." "Thin, be the holy poker, if ye are so good at guessing, ye'd better guess the way to Burlington."

An editor asks, in talking of poetry and matrimony: "Who would indite sonnets to a woman whom he saw every morning in her night-cap, and every day at dinner swallowing meat and mustard?"

A gipsy woman promised to show to two young ladies their husbands' faces in a pail of water. They looked, and exclaimed, "Why, we only see our own faces." "Well," said the gipsy, "those faces will be your husbands' when you are married."

"Stirring times," as the hasty pudding said to the spoon.

A little girl describes a snake as "a thing that's a tail all the way up to his head."

What Roman general do the ladies ask for in leap year? Marius (marry us).

The quickest way to acquire a knowledge of "tanning," is to insult a prize fighter's wife.

The only medicinal herb for a "mind diseased" is proverbs.

What man is there who, had he a window in his breast, would not speedily pull down the blinds?

A woman advertising for a husband wants him to be not only "strictly religious, but of good character."

"Excuse me, madam, but I would like to ask why you look at me so very savagely?" "O, beg pardon, sir—I took you for my husband!"

In Canada they boil everything for greens, beginning with mullen leaves, and leaving off with the window blinds.

If "cleanliness is necessary to godliness," the morals of the New York street inspectors must be at a very low ebb.

Why is the young Prince of Algiers like the hind quarter of a beef? Because he is the least bony part (least Bonaparte).

Ladies are like watches—pretty enough to look at—sweet faces and delicate hands, but somewhat difficult to "regulate" when set "a going."

It is thought that the Brutus who slew Cæsar was some relation to the Crow Family, for in his speech to the populace he opens with, "Hear me for my causes!"

A fellow just returned from a fight, in which he came off second best, was asked what made him look so sheepish. "Because," said he, "I have been and got lammed!"

The Boston Gazette propounds the following spirited con.: "If I owed a man five dollars, what liquor would I resemble? Ans.—Eau de vie (owed a V)."

"Zounds! fellow," exclaimed a choleric old gentleman to a very phlegmatic matter-of-fact person, "I shall go out of my wits." "Well, you wont have far to go," said the phlegmatic man.

"My dear Coleridge," said Charles Lamb once to his old and dear friend, "you are one of the very best men in England; you have but one infirmity, you always fail just when you happen to have a duty to perform."

"Here," said a dandy to an Irish laborer, "come and tell me the biggest lie you ever told in your life, and I'll treat you to a whiskey punch." "An' by my sowl," replied the Hibernian, quickly, "yer honor is a gentleman."

One of the miseries of human life is being a compositor on a newspaper, and having to insert the marriage of the girl you love with a man old enough to be your father—he is rich and you are poor.

A young fellow having been charged with getting drunk the night before, and wishing to justify himself, declared "he never was drunk, and never meant to be; for it always made him feel so bad the next morning."

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. IV.—No. 4.

BOSTON, OCTOBER, 1856.

WHOLE No. 22.

THE HEROINE OF BUNKER HILL.

BY GEORGE H. BURMAN.

On the old road from Boston to Medford, there stands a lofty dwelling, whose spacious gardens and cultivated groves bespeak the presence of wealth and elegant taste. With little change from what it now is, more than seventy years it stood, overlooking the little village of Mystic on the one hand, and the panorama of hills which crowded the prospect towards the city when Gage and the British flag held compulsory dominion.

Weld House was justly celebrated as the abode of hospitality and refinement. Its owner, a West Indian by birth, claimed kindred on one side from an old English family, some of whose members had been of note in the history of the mother land. But in the veins of John Weld also flowed colonial blood, from a stock long eminent in New England for the sturdy virtues of patriotism and persevering resistance to tyranny. Thus connected, Judge Weld was influenced by two opposing forces, which combined to prevent him from open action, either for king or congress. It was not that he needed courage, wisdom, or determination, in thus remaining neutral. His course was, in a great degree, the result of such a foresight as few men of his strong predilections possessed. His prejudices were decidedly those of birth and rank. An aristocracy, governed by throne and court, and a subordinate people, obedient and submissive to their hereditary condition, were themes congenial to his habitual thought. His spirit chafed at the rebellious efforts which he deemed subversive of venerable and praiseworthy principles.

All this, however, did not prevent him from perceiving that the power of England over America was about to undergo a peril whose final result might be that of disaster and defeat, quite as possibly as that of triumph. He foresaw that, in setting himself against the patriotic tide, he would put to risk the comfort of his family to an unusual degree, in that the means of sustaining themselves in society would be instantly swept away on the event of revolutionary success. Wealth, rank and honors were very dear to John Weld, and he took such a course as, in his mind, seemed most likely to secure their retention.

Nor was the judge by any means an evil or selfish man. Determined in his opinions and his prejudices, unchangeable in his will when once his mind was fixed on a course such as he felt that prudence would approve (and he was careful to make no choice without consulting that), he nevertheless inclined, in all things, to humanity and what he considered a just regard for the rights of others. To sum up his character, he was a proud man—kindly dispositioned in many things, but always jealous of his position, ever heedful of the social respect which was his due, and a man not to be flouted with impunity, either at home or abroad. He had now been several years retired from legal office, but when he sat on the judicial bench, it had been said that no one of his compeers brought to his place such a dignity of personal bearing as was manifested by himself. There was certainly that in Judge Weld's appearance which would have impressed itself on the most inattentive observer. He possessed a noble form, features firm-set and massive, an eagle eye, and a step like that of a lord. Judge Weld was one of nature's noblemen.

To his masculine qualities, the character of his lady presented an admirable foil. In her youth she had been toasted as a belle, and years had not effaced the beauty of features which still continued attractive, although they had long faded from their lustrous rose and white. Her mind, which in early life, had been somewhat romantic in tendency, had been tempered by experience, so that without losing aught of its finer qualities, it had gained the matronly stability so desirable in that middle age which she had now attained. But her character, though modelled by circumstance, was not radically changed, and exerted on her only child an influence of which she herself was hardly conscious.

In Florence Weld, her mother's comparatively passive susceptibility was vivified by the inheritance of her father's energetic will and a goodly portion of his physical vigor. She would weep at night over a leaf of Richardson's stilted novels, or feed with eager eye on some favorite poem, and on the morn be none the less ready to push her gallant steed at a wall, or a ditch, such as few provincial beaux would have liked to attempt. To this class of admirers, indeed, Florence was for the most part an object of equal dread and admiration. She dealt not in pretty nothings—she was not beautifully weak and vapid. On the contrary, her ardent disposition rendered her too little apt at concealment of likes or dislikes—too willing to point the keen arrows of her wit against coxcombs of mind or manner. In these stirring times, when the sound of cannon and the call to arms were in all men's dreams, there were not many of the neighboring youths who chose to act the gallant's part, and bask in lady's bower; and those who did so choose, were not the ones most likely to attract her regard.

Florence, therefore, obtained the reputation of a proud, disdainful beauty, who had no intention of giving herself to a man of middle station. She aspired, so it was said, to wed with lofty rank—to join herself to splendid fortunes and a titled name. Gossip went so far, indeed, as to point out the favored suitor, who was declared to be a promising young officer belonging to one of the British regiments then stationed in Boston. Major Allerton was the son and heir of Lord Allerton, of Oxfordshire, England. He had met Florence at a ball given in Boston nearly two years before the time of our story's commencement. Strongly attracted by her beauty and piquancy of manner, the young officer procured an introduction which he lost no time in following up. His name and station readily opened to him the doors of Weld Hall, so long, at least, as he was able to avail himself of his right of entry, and the welcome which its owner right freely extended.

In the eyes of Judge Weld, a noble name, good personal appearance, wealth, a manner gentlemanly and polished almost to extreme, joined to talents not at all contemptible, certainly warranted his approbation of the young officer's evident intentions. But the major's attentions were not so well received by the daughter. As a visitant, she received him with a proper respect. She conversed with him civilly, but never unreservedly. The slightest advance, on his part, was instantly repelled by a frigidity of manner totally opposite to her usual demeanor.

At length the young officer, impatient of delay, and determined not to receive the ill omen which lurked in the maiden's ways, ventured on an open declaration of his attachment. His suit was at once declined—so decidedly, too, on his further urgency, that the humbled and incensed gallant forsook the house forthwith, hardly knowing which was more justly the object of his indignation, himself, or the capricious country girl who had presumed to reject the offers of Major Henry Allerton, the favored child of fortune, the pride of fashion's circle, whose foot had been always welcome in lady's bower, and whose self-complacent regard had hitherto ever basked in the sunlight of beauty's smiles. Weld Hall was henceforth deprived of his presence. The judge presently took alarm at his continued absence, and was not long in arriving at a pretty correct suspicion of its cause. On questioning Florence, the truth was elicited. The judge lectured her severely on what he termed her whimsical and unreasonable conduct. He even went the length of declaring his intention to recall the young major, provided that intention could be accomplished in a manner consistent with propriety. The peremptory admonition of the judge was met with a firmness which he had not prepared himself to expect.

"Father," said Florence in reply, "if you choose to give special invitation to the major, as you would to any other guest, I certainly can make no objection to your purpose. But if you propose this in order to give me opportunity to change my mind, I must say that your scheme will be altogether in vain. Were it possible for the major to make a second trial, he would find that what I have said once, I can readily say again."

Her father regarded her for a few moments with a stern countenance. His black, bushy brows settled down over his eyes, which glowed with a more piercing light from the very shadow which sought to obscure them.

"Girl," he said, "this would never have taken place without a cause. You have given no decent reason for rejecting a man every way worthy—one whom most maidens would have accepted with very little urgency. How is it? Have you, then, picked up some gallant of your own choice—some knight paladin—whom of your own free will you have endowed with all impossible perfections?"

Florence, who had received her father's reproofs with tolerable calmness, heard his final question with some agitation. Her discomposure but increased with the reiteration of the question.

"I cannot deny that there is, in some measure—"

"Name him!" said the judge, hastily. "Will you obey me?" he continued, after waiting a moment for her reply.

The harsh tone in which the command was uttered, summoned up her spirit afresh. She lifted her face, brilliant with the very flush of excitement; she met the gaze fixed upon her with a countenance deprecatory of anger, but still unshaken, save when the mobile lips were unable to restrain the lingering fear which trembled in their undulating jointure. So beautiful did she appear, that the chagrin of the judge gradually yielded to the mollifying influence, and when he again repeated his demand, it was in a milder tone than before.

"William Andrews," replied Florence, in a low voice. And as she spoke, her face was half averted, her eyes sought the floor, and her whole form seemed instinct with apprehension of the consequences which should result from her unwilling avowal.

The judge could hardly credit his own ears.

"William Andrews! William Andrews!" he exclaimed, slowly repeating the words, as though to assure himself that he could not have been mistaken. "It cannot be; else you are more mad, even, than I had supposed that you could be. Have I heard aright? A young man of no birth, unpolished in manners—what is there, pray, to make him so attractive to you? Let us have no more of this folly," he added, rising from his seat and taking up his riding-gloves preparatory to going out on his morning's business. "Have nothing further to do with this young Andrews. Discontinue, at once, whatever acquaintance you have with him, however slight, and recollect that, though I have seldom laid on you a positive command, yet when I find occasion to do so, it must be implicitly obeyed."

As Andrews was at this time absent in New Hampshire, where he was like to remain for several months, the judge had no fear of his commands being at present infringed. He considered the affair, furthermore, as a girlish caprice, which was most absurd in itself, and which needed nothing more than the exertion of a little straightforward authority to be at once stifled. He was perfectly satisfied that there could not be, in the nature of things, any enduring attachment between Florence and the unpolished rustic, as he termed the most unwelcome rival of the elegant and accomplished Major Allerton.

Andrews was the son of a farmer resident some fifty miles from Boston. Having, when a mere boy, been taken by the village lawyer to do the errands and common drudgery of his office, the boy's capacity was so evident, that his master, after a year or two, entered him as a student of law, and assisted his early struggles with such money loans as his necessities required. He had nearly finished his course, when an accidental meeting brought him acquainted with Florence Weld. Her intuitive keenness, and not less than this, her slight regard for the arbitrary boundaries of social rank, almost instantly led her to appreciate the genius of the student, and to feel an admiration and a sympathy which opportunity only increased. On his part, Andrews was even more readily attracted by the beauty and generous frankness of the high-spirited maiden, and was not slow to improve himself in her good graces—that is to say, after he had taken sufficient care to assure himself in the outset of the nature of the ground on which he ventured. For the young lawyer was sensitively alive to the difference between his own position and that of the high-bred Florence, and naught but a genuine sentiment, which was in a similar measure returned, would ever have induced him to overlook the distinction while that distinction existed. Nevertheless, being ambitious, he hoped that time would do much to lessen the intervening space, and so to time he hopefully trusted.

In a few weeks, the quarrel between the government and its rebellious subjects arrived at its height. The battle of Lexington in a moment kindled the fire of patriotism to a fervid flame. The whole country rose in arms. Boston was literally besieged by a raw militia, leavened by a few veterans who had fought the French and Indians under the very flags, possibly, which floated over familiar faces—faces of those who, companions in arms, had now by the fate of civil war, become their bounden enemies. The undisciplined army was officered as best it might be; and men of little or no experience often received promotion to places of responsibility on no other grounds than that of natural capacity. Andrews, having returned from New Hampshire (where, indeed, he had been engaged in some matters pertaining to the present crisis), was appointed to a captaincy in a regiment stationed not far from Weld Hall.

It may well be imagined that, neighborhood and opportunity favoring, it was no long time before Florence and the captain met again. Florence, with praiseworthy resolution, though with the deepest grief, declared the necessity of mutual forgetfulness. This severe decree was naturally met with earnest remonstrance. The result was, that after two or three interviews, a discovery took place at the hall. Florence was bitterly reprimanded by the judge, and she was closely confined within her own chamber for several days. What success this procedure found, will presently be seen, and whether the quality of locks proved better than in other cases of similar nature.

The story of the 17th of June, 1775, is probably more familiar to the New Englander, in all its minuteness of detail, than that of any other national event which has occurred in past time. The monument which overtops the city of Charlestown is reared upon the corner stone of his liberties; and when we come to speak of what it commemorates, we have little need to refresh the memory of our readers with regard to the current of events which on that day took place. We have only so far to mention them, as they are directly connected with the course of our narrative.

The company of Captain Andrews was stationed for the most part at the rail fence which ran along the most exposed portion of the American lines. A few of the privates, only, were protected by defences somewhat more secure than those of their fellows. The nature of their position made it necessary for the company to exert themselves to the utmost in order to strengthen their frail works, as far as possible, before the approach of the enemy. The continued labor began to be felt by all, especially by the more youthful who were not inured to manual toil. Andrews had noticed two or three, whom, in his own mind, he declared more fitting to remain by the family fireside, than here, mere boys, to be acting the part of full grown soldiers. The thought had hardly passed through his mind, when it was re-echoed by a stout, iron haired officer, who touching him on the shoulder, accosted him as follows:

"How goes it with you here, captain? D'ye think your lads will be able to stand fire?"

"I'll warrant them, general," was the reply.

Putnam gave a quick, eager look with his blue eyes along the ranks before him. Then turning again to his companion:

"Some of your company would hardly come up to regulations, captain, if we were to be particular in such matters. For instance, I fancy that were I the mother of one smooth-faced youngster whom I have just seen, I would have taken his gun from him and set him to sweep the kitchen, instead of permitting him here. But never mind. It shows the right stuff—the right stuff!"

And the general passed on. There was a transient sadness in the expression of his voice which communicated itself to the mind of the young officer, as the latter listened to the cannon of the British fleet sending forth their iron shower, premonitory of the storm soon to burst upon the rustic and untried army of the Americans. A vivid picture of mangled bodies and desolated homes, rose in the fancy of the thinker. But such thoughts were only momentary. The requirements of duty, the excitement of expectation, the thrill with which the sound of battle stirs the soldier's heart—all these allowed little chance for sentiment. Every one was busied in making preparation for the masses, which, forming into line at the shore, began to move forward with steady step towards the summit. Onward and onward, till from the rude mounds a sea of flame burst forth and tore the proud array asunder, as does the whirlwind the ranks of shining grain. Again and again death levelled the advancing lines in bloody swarths along the declivity of the hill. They fled, they rallied, and again, with desperate resolution, nerved themselves to fresh attempt.

But now the faces of the brave defenders are clouded with sullen gloom. They see their foes moving up to the bloody boundary where a heaped line of dead bodies show an ominous warning. But cartridge-box and pouch are empty, and as the exulting Britons pour over the low bulwark, musket stocks and stones are the weapons which keep in check the fatal bayonet. The Americans retreat slowly and sullenly, face to face with the foe. But the rail-fence is still manned. Its holders must needs devote themselves to cover the retreat of their mates. One more volley; the assailants for a moment fall back; they push forward again; but the object is gained, and Andrews and his gallant companions follow the retreating army. But their numbers lessen fast; one by one they fall before their exasperated enemies. Even now, a slight and youthful form sinks with a despairing cry to the earth. The countenance of the poor boy is turned aside with hopeless terror. It is seen by Andrews, and a thrill of horror shoots through his frame as he springs forward and throws himself on the bayonet of the soldier.

"Hold!" he cried. "It is a woman whom you seek to kill!"

Then sight and feeling fled, and all was blank. Immediately after the battle was over, it was deemed advisable that one of the subordinate generals should proceed to Boston for oversight of certain hospital arrangements. General Munro took it upon himself to attend to the business, and was proceeding from the western portion of the intrenchment to take boat across the river, when he came directly upon the lovers, who still lay as they had fallen, a little within the line of intrenchment. Something in their appearance arrested the attention of the general. He dismounted, and bending over, carefully examined the features of the captain, which were somewhat disfigured by an ugly cut on the forehead. With only a cursory glance at Florence, for such the reader discovers to have been the disguised companion of the wounded officer, the general ordered some of the soldiers to convey them both to his boat. His hearers, wondering at the agitation which he displayed, readily obeyed; and were accompanied on their errand by Munro, who, pacing slowly by their side, showed the most intense regard of their charge. Having passed from the Charlestown landing to Gray's Wharf, he accompanied his companions from thence to his own quarters, where Florence and her friend, by this time much revived, were placed in adequate care. Their host then hastened away to attend to the business with which he was entrusted.

It was some hours before he returned, when he found his patients thriving admirably. Florence, who had suffered more from the effect of extreme emotion than from any other cause, and who had received no serious injury, was in the chamber assigned to her by the general's lady. To the latter, Florence, at the earliest instance of opportunity, confided the secret of her sex, and the imprudence of which she had been guilty in flying from her home-prison to enact the part of an Amazonian heroine. She trembled and shed tears, when speaking of the battle and her part in it.

"I found," she said, "how little I had known of the horrors of such a scene, and how much I had over-estimated my own courage. I have been taught, to-day, the lesson that woman can never with impunity overstep the boundaries of her natural character. I trust that the suffering which I have experienced will be found a sufficient punishment for my folly."

Lady Munro, notwithstanding the sympathy which she felt for her charge, could not help smiling at the maiden's story, and the unconscious simplicity with which it was related.

"Do not grieve yourself so much about the matter," she replied. "I fancy that your romantic adventure will not, after all, meet with any very serious consequences. And I am glad to find that you have a very just sense of propriety, notwithstanding a little eccentricity such as a soldier's wife, like myself, will find small difficulty in pardoning."

"Make yourself easy on the score of your family," she said to her, some time afterward. "The general will send a messenger to the opposite lines, and your father will be duly informed of your being safely bestowed in our keeping. When he arrives, I think we shall show him sufficient reason for overlooking the past."

Florence regarded her hostess with a curious air, perceiving that the emphasis with which she spoke had its origin in a cause as yet unknown to her hearer. And when, on the following day, she met the general and Captain Andrews at breakfast, she observed that they both manifested an occasional abstraction of manner. She even endeavored to be offended by her admirer's want of attention toward herself. But the attempt signally failed; and she was fain to wait as contentedly as might be till the fancied mystery should receive solution.

It was somewhere in the latter part of the afternoon, that a carriage stopped in front of the house. Florence, glancing through the half-closed shutter of the window where she sat, saw the occupant of the carriage alight and approach the doorstep. Turning pale, she rose and moved away.

"He has come!" she said; and clasping her hands, cast an irresistible look of entreaty on the worthy general. The latter smiled, and pointed to the door of an adjoining room.

"We will excuse you for the present," he said, "till we have succeeded in making terms for your capitulation to the proper authority. Go there; there is not much fear, I think, but that we can manage it."

Florence retired, and the servant, throwing open the parlor door, announced the visitor.

The latter, with a low bow, passed through the doorway, but drew back with an indignant look on seeing Captain Andrews before him. The general laid his hand upon the judge's arm.

"Respected sir," he said, "be composed, I pray you, and listen to the intercession which I wish to make for these young people. But first let me introduce to you my son, William Munro."

As he uttered this with a wave of the hand towards the captain, the judge fixed on the general and his guest a look of the most profound astonishment. But he made no answer, and his glance travelling quickly around the apartment, returned with an expressive anxiety to the countenance of Munro.

"My daughter!"

Florence sprang from her concealment, and threw herself, sobbing and trembling, into her father's arms. The general waited till the ebullition of feeling had subsided, and then, conducting the judge to a comfortable arm-chair, and establishing the young lady by his side, proceeded to further explanation.

"You have, my dear sir," he said, "manifested a very natural surprise at the assertion which I have just made with regard to a certain youth here present. If the evidence of its truth, however, shall be as satisfactory to you as it is to myself, I think that you will need no proof beyond what I am able to afford. It is now about twenty-five years since, that I was stationed, with a troop of soldiers under my command, at a fort then recently erected near the mouth of the Kennebec River. My wife, a tender young creature, with an infant only a few months old, had so earnestly remonstrated against being separated from her 'dear Henry' (as she was pleased to entitle your humble servant), that I was fain to allow her to accompany me to my secluded post. It may be imagined that she met not with much society in her new habitation. But Mary seemed to occupy herself quite agreeably with the company of myself and her child, who was the same miniature wonder that every other mother's first baby is known to be.

"Our nurse having fallen sick, my wife took it into her head to employ in her stead a young Indian woman, who had often visited the house, and who had shown a great attachment to the child, bringing it frequently some trifle formed of bright colored beads or minute shells. Nureka gladly assented to the proposition that she should live with us for a time, and have the care of our boy; and though at first I had a little misgiving about the matter, I became soon quite satisfied with the youngster's new guardian. But, to shorten a story which I fear is getting a little tedious, by-and-by it was proved to our sorrow that, however tamed and softened a savage nature may become, there is no certain security against an outbreak of its original wildness.

"One day Nureka received some reproach from my wife, at which she manifested a little resentment, which, however, was apparently soon dissipated. That evening she and the boy were missing. I need not speak of the anguish of Mary and myself. I never saw Nureka afterward; nor my son, till I recognized him on the battle-ground, wounded and insensible. Singular as it is, the instant that I saw his face, I knew its likeness to his mother's features. There can be no self-deception. You yourself will presently have opportunity to see the resemblance. The age agrees, and the birth-mark which the child bore on the right breast still remains. Furthermore, William learned a few months since that he was not really the child of his reputed parents. There, I have finished my evidence, doubtless much to the satisfaction of Miss Florence, who I perceive does not as yet rest assured of your forgiveness. If I find she is not likely to conquer it, I promise her all the assistance which can be afforded by an old fellow like myself."

That the judge did not discover any lasting obduracy, will be seen from the fact that in the evening, as he sat apart with the general and his lady, the preliminaries to a certain anticipated marriage were pretty freely discussed. The troubled state of the times, and the position of the captain as to political affairs, might have interposed temporary difficulties in the way of his immediate union with Florence. But it was acknowledged by all, that, under the circumstances of his newly discovered relationship, the young officer was certainly, for the time being, bound to relinquish all extreme action against the principles which his father sustained. Therefore, the marriage of the young people took place in the course of a few weeks.

Captain Munro, having relinquished military action, remained quiet at home till the death of his father, which took place in 1777. Then, considering himself no longer pledged to seclusion, he took arms once more, joined the American army, and served with much distinction till the end of the war, when he retired with the rank of colonel, and the universal esteem of his brother officers; while his lovely companion received from her admiring neighbors the appellation of THE HEROINE OF BUNKER HILL.

It is the part of a man to be afflicted with grief, to feel sorrow, at the same time that he is to resist it, and to admit of comfort.

BURY ME NOT IN THE SEA.

BY LUCY M. DEAN.

"O, bury me not in the deep, deep sea!"
The words came faint and mournfully
From the pallid lips of a youth, who lay
On his cabin couch, where, day by day,
He had wasted and pined, till o'er his brow
The death shade had slowly passed, and now,
When the land and his fond, loved home were nigh,
They had gathered around to see him die.

"O, bury me not in the deep, deep sea,
Where the billow shroud will roll o'er me,
Where no light can break through the cold wave,
And no sunbeam linger above my grave;
It matters not, I have been told,
Where the body shall lie when the heart is cold;
Yet grant ye, O grant ye this boon to me,
O bury, me not in the deep, deep sea.

"Let my death-chamber be where a father's prayer
And a sister's tears will be blanded there;
O, 'twill be sweet, ere the heart-throb is o'er,
To know when its fountain shall gush no more,
That thou it so fondly has yearned for will come
To plant the first wild flowers of spring on my tomb;
Let me lie where those loved ones can weep over me—
O, bury me not in the deep, deep sea.

"And there is another—her tears would be shed
For him who lay far in a cold, ocean bed;
In hours that it pains me to think of now,
She has twined these locks, and kissed this brow;
In the hair she wreathed shall the sea-serpent hiss,
The brow she pressed shall the cold waves kiss;
For the sake of that bright one who waits for me,
O, bury me not in the deep, deep sea.

"She hath been in my dreams"—his voice failed there;
They gave no heed to his dying prayer;
They lowered him slow o'er the vessel's side,
And above has closed the cold dark tide,
Where to dip her wing the sea-fowl rests,
Where the blue waves dance with their foaming crests,
Where the billows bound, and the winds sport free,
They have buried him there in the deep, deep sea.

MR. AND MRS. BLIMMERGLASS.

BY RALPH TRYON.

MRS. BLIMMERGLASS was rocking vigorously in her capacious chair. We say capacious, for the dimensions of that worthy lady were very ample, and could not easily be contained in a chair of ordinary magnitude. The clouds which were rapidly concentrating in the vicinity of her brows, and the particularly unamiable expression of her features as she regarded her spouse, gave evidence of a domestic storm soon to fall on his unconscious head.

He was minus his coat, and quietly adjusting his cravat before the octagon mirror, which formed the summit of a neat dressing bureau, and which that little man—he was very small—had inclined towards him, in order to be enabled to view his diminutive proportions; while the various turns and twists of his head made it evident that he was by no means dissatisfied with his personal appearance.

"Mr. Blimmerglass!" she at length exclaimed, giving particular emphasis to the "Mr."

The little man turned and started, as if to dodge the bolt which he discovered gleaming in her eyes, that had often favored him with their electric shocks, to which, by the by, he was by no means partial.

"Well, my dear," he answered plaintively.

"So you are going out this evening?"

"Yes—certainly—that was my intention."

"Pray, is it your intention to go out every night?"

"Not precisely, my love."

"Don't 'my love' me, Mr. Blimmerglass.

Haven't you been absent every evening for more than a fortnight? and do you call that setting a good example, as the head of a family, to be rambling about nights when you ought to be at home?"

"You know very well where I go."

"I know where you say you go—to Buncomb's to discuss political matters; but saying and doing are different things."

"I hope you do not doubt my veracity, Mrs. Blimmerglass," said the party addressed, making a vain effort to summon up a look of offended dignity.

"I have never caught you in a falsehood," was the defiant answer; "but if you do deceive me, you won't find me the mild, submissive wife that I always have been. I don't doubt your word yet, but heaven knows what I may be brought to do. I do not like to be so neglected, and as for having you out every night, I won't allow it."

"Moral suasion, Mrs. B.—moral suasion."

"Moral fiddlesticks! Haven't I tried it until I am tired? and what has come of it—anything? No, I shall pursue a very different course! I shall insist upon my rights and I will find a way to maintain them!"

Quite a pause ensued, during which the storm had considerably abated. Blimmerglass saw this, and made an effort to recall a little sunshine.

"You know the strength of my affection," he said, "and know that I would not willingly absent myself from you; but a man, now-a-days, must take some stand in the political world, to be thought anything of—and you surely would not wish to be the wife of a nobody! I have a pride to become somebody, for your sake, Mrs. Blimmerglass."

"I know politics is politics, but women are women, and are not fond of being slighted," replied the wife, somewhat mollified, for the idea of being the wife of a nobody never occurred to her before, and she by no means relished it.

"What, slight you!" he exclaimed, looking as though he would annihilate any giant that would dare to make the assertion; "why, I never thought of such a thing."

"I am very glad to hear it, Peter; but to keep from being a nobody, will you be obliged to keep from home every night?"

"Certainly not, my dear. Suppose I was to tell you that after to night I should not be absent more than two evenings, during the week, until election comes off, and after that, very seldom except in your company, what would you say?"

"I should begin to think that you were coming to your senses."

"Mrs. Blimmerglass, allow me to trust that I have never been out of them."

"Just as you please, Peter. You know that I am never disposed to commence a quarrel with you!"

"Just so," answered the little man, in a tone that implied much doubt.

Mrs. Blimmerglass did not inflict upon him any further persecution on this occasion, but allowed her Peter to depart in peace as soon as he had completed his toilet.

Blimmerglass, notwithstanding his mild submission to the iron rule of his wife, was considered by the world as a rising man. He would drive a sharp bargain, and knew how to purchase real estate as well as any man in the county; and his discreet speculations had made him one of the largest landholders in the town. Peter, like other men of the world, had ambition; and as he was now rich, he looked with a longing eye into the political arena, thinking he could afford a little of his time for public matters tending, of course, to the public good. His aspirations, however, were very moderate, and the only honor that he hoped to achieve in reward for his labors, was a seat at the board of selectmen.

Buncomb was just the man to help him in this instance, for he was a scheming politician of fair abilities, and had his own interest in view, as by aiding Blimmerglass, he looked forward to the day when he might count upon his help to return him to the legislature, of which he was now a member.

While Peter pursued his way, indulging in dreams of parish greatness, his wife rocked very complacently in her chair at home, little thinking of the shock her woman's susceptibilities were soon to endure. At a later hour her brother came in, somewhat flushed and excited, and threw himself heavily into a chair, as though suffering from unusual fatigue.

"Why William," she exclaimed, "how tired you look! Pray, what have you been doing?"

"I believe I have been walking pretty fast. By the by, I met Peter this evening in rather peculiar circumstances; but I presume that you know all about it."

"I know that he was going to Buncomb's."

"Well, I must say that he was taking a peculiar route to get there."

"You alarm me. But do be a little more explicit, brother."

"Well I will, when you tell me who that fair lady was, that he seemed to be so careful about."

"William, are you crazy? I know nothing of any such lady. Ah, now I see it all! You are attempting to make me the victim of one of your silly jokes."

"I assure you that I am perfectly serious, and moreover, I was much struck with her beauty. Peter sent me here to tell you that he was unexpectedly obliged to be absent until a later hour than usual, and wished me to sit with you until his return. I believe he mentioned something about riding over to D—, which is about eight miles, you know."

"Then you saw him riding with a lady?"

"I did."

"And he had the coolness to stop and speak with you?"

"To be sure, sister. You know that Peter and I are excellent friends, and I should have thought it very singular, if he had not."

"You say that she was pretty—the jade?"

"Beautiful! I declare I really envied Peter the happiness of such a ride."

"The heartless wretch! This comes of his being out so much almost every evening, while I—poor confiding woman—thought he was only wasting his time in politics! I see it all now. The pains he always takes with his dress, the mildness with which he received the scolding I gave him to-night, his anxiety to avoid my society, his new-fangled notions of ambition—all show his infatuation for this creature, and his indifference to me, his lawful wife. And you too, William, can sit there calmly and see your own sister thus wronged—insulted, and think it all very proper, no doubt?"

"To be plain with you, I think that if Peter were guilty of indiscretion, you would only have to thank yourself for the misery your own ill temper has brought upon you."

"I declare, you will drive me mad. How can you make so cruel a remark, when you see that I am entirely prostrated with this blow?"

"Because, sister," said her brother, with a coolness that contrasted strangely with the excited state of the lady, "I think it is the proper time that you should receive a lesson which should last your lifetime. The fact is, that Peter has been a kind husband—too indulgent by half, at least; and what have you done to make his home happy? Have you not on every slight occasion given the full vent to your shrewish disposition? Have you not, for the most trivial affairs, visited upon his head a torrent of shameless abuse, until your unwomanly conduct has become the theme of town gossip? And who, I ask, would blame him, if to seek a momentary respite from such persecution, he should occupy a portion of his leisure with those who appreciated his good qualities, and gave him smiles instead of frowns?"

Mrs. Blimmerglass was sobbing violently. The words of her brother had touched her to the very quick. She had many excellent qualities and was altogether a good-hearted woman, and for the first time began to see her past conduct in its true light. To do her justice, she felt much worse at the idea of having treated her husband with injustice, than she did for the town gossip, which was also very humiliating to her pride. Her conscience told her that what had just been said was true, and she mentally vowed, that if Peter cleared up the matter of this ride and acquaintance with this strange lady, she would prove to him, in future, a different sort of wife.

Her brother saw the impression he had made, and was determined to make it lasting. He therefore proceeded to review the past with a minuteness almost cruel, but which resulted in such self-condemnation on the part of the lady, that she was fully prepared to forgive Peter for whatever he had done, even without an explanation.

At a late hour a carriage stopped at their gate, and in a few moments Blimmerglass entered with his usual bustle, but evidently in excellent spirits. His wife looked thoughtful, but not a shade of anger tinged her brow; while William burst into a loud fit of laughter at the singular appearance of his friend. His coat was soiled and torn, his elegant vest discolored, his shirt collar wofully rumpled, his hat a perfect wreck, and one eye bore a circle around it swollen and quite black.

"Well," said Blimmerglass, "I fancy that I do cut rather a ridiculous figure, but the end often justifies the means—hey, Sally?"

"Your own conscience is the best judge of that, Mr. Blimmerglass," said the lady, in a tone of mild reproach, at the same time looking puzzled, for she knew not how to account for the disordered attire of her husband; and she was also thinking that he did not appear to wear the guilty look which she expected from one who, to say the least, had committed a gross indiscretion.

"Conscience! what in the world are you talking about, Sally? I thought you would have commended my conduct, instead of speaking so coldly."

"The fact is," said William, with a malicious look, "that I only told Sally a small part of the story, and she has imagined all the evening that you were riding with a beautiful young creature for whom you had a very tender regard."

"And she knows nothing of our adventure?"

"Not a word. I couldn't have the heart to deprive you of the pleasure of the relation of this affair, especially as you played the part of a hero in it."

"Ah, William, you are a sad dog, and by your nonsense have no doubt made poor Sally quite uncomfortable; but to pay you for the trouble you have caused, you must tell her all the particulars, for I am not going to say one word about it."

"The adventure was quite a lively one," said the brother, "and it happened thus: My good friend here was plodding along to the residence of Buncomb, and as he was walking in the road which leads through the woods, he was startled by cries of distress at some little distance in advance of him. He at once hastened to the spot and found a young lady, with a little girl, probably her sister, seated in a chaise, while a fellow had seized the bridle of the horse, and rudely declared that she should not proceed unless she allowed him to accompany her, or rather to drive her home. The miscreant was probably intoxicated and so were his companions, who were in an open wagon near by.

"Peter made no inquiries, but at once knocked the villain down, while his dissolute friends leaped from the wagon and made a cowardly attack upon your husband. It was just at this time that I was coming along the same road in an opposite direction, intending to pass the evening with you, when hearing the noise, I hurried up to find Peter defending himself like a hero against the assaults of the three scamps, and at once dashed amongst them and in a few moments we had conquered the field, while our opponents lay at our feet, endeavoring to recover the senses which we had knocked out of them for a time, at least. The lady was very much frightened, as you might imagine, and we sooceeded at length in pacifying the child, who after the trouble was over, still continued to exert her lungs to their full power in screaming.

"The stranger begged Peter to drive her home, as she felt so excited, that she was not competent to the task. He very good naturedly gave up his appointment with Buncomb, and consented. She expressed her gratitude in the sweetest manner, and as I said to you this evening, I really envied him the ride with such a beautiful creature. When I left, the fellows had got by some means into their wagon and beat a hasty retreat."

"But," said Blimmerglass, "you do not know who she was, and I have the start of you there. She is the daughter of Judge P——, who sent his compliments and requests that you will favor him with a visit, at the earliest possible moment, that he may have the opportunity of expressing to you his gratitude. What do you think of that, Will?"

"I think I will ride over with you some fine afternoon, just to have a peep at his fair daughter."

"Now, Sally, what have you got to say?" said the amiable Peter.

"That I have been very foolish in doubting my dear husband for a moment; but the blame all rests with that young scapegrace brother of mine," at the same time encircling his neck with her fat arms so tightly, that the little man feared he should suffer strangulation.

"That is right, sister," said William; "lay it all to me. But do you not think that the end may justify the means?"

She shook one finger at him threateningly, for the early conversation of the evening recurred to her with full force, and she perfectly understood his meaning.

Blimmerglass, after weeks of sunshine, was at a loss how to account for the change in the conduct of his wife, which was as agreeable as it was incomprehensible to him. Home had new charms, and it was hard work for his friends to entice him abroad now, except in company with Mrs. Blimmerglass. In the mean time their brother, William Senter, had become a pretty frequent visitant at Judge P——'s, and in less than two years afterward, claimed the title of son-in-law, by which he came into possession of the hand of the fairest bride in the county.

Blimmerglass, after having filled the office of selectman with much ability, only resigned his place to occupy a seat in our State Legislature, where his practical talents make him particularly conspicuous as one of the most untiring working members of the "House."

RETRIBUTION.

BY CLEMENT ARNOLD.

"If you persist in marrying him, Mary, you shall rue it until your dying day."

"My mind is made up, Richard, and my resolution taken. Henry Marsden does not deserve your ill will, and you know it; why then persist in making us unhappy?"

"Beware, Mary, how you cross me! You know I hate him; with my whole soul I hate him, and my hatred shall extend to his wife—ay, and to his children after him!" And white with rage, the speaker rose from his chair and stood before his companion. "What is your reason for making such a choice? What can induce you to disgrace your family, by taking a miserable, beggarly artist for your husband, when you have Caroline's example to profit by, and even a better prospect than she had?"

The death-like paleness gave place to an angry flush on Mary Lassell's fair cheek, as she rose and stood before her brother.

"Would you know my reason?" she asked, her voice half choked with a sense of outraged feeling, and sounding strangely to one used to its gentle tones. "Hear it then: I shall marry Henry Marsden because I love him; I love him because he is the embodiment of all that is noble in man. I respect him; I honor him. Can Caroline say the same of Lord Ravenscourt? Could I say the same of his cousin?"

The speaker turned away; but catching her hand, Richard exclaimed with a look of rage:

"Marry him then!—and on you both may the heaviest curses light; may poverty and wretchedness be your constant companions; may your hearts be torn with anguish and your dearest hopes be crushed." And flinging her from him, Richard Lassell rushed from the room, while his sister sank fainting to the ground.

It was a sad scene. The large, gloomy room, with its old-fashioned, ancient look; the portrait of the dead mother on the wall; the figure of the youngest daughter of the house prostrate and senseless on the floor, the victim of an only brother's cruelty, that brother's curses still sounding in the room;—what bitter fruits of passion!

Six-and-twenty years before the commencement of our history, the only son and heir of Sir Richard Lassell had wooed, and he thought won, the heart of a fair daughter of a proud but penniless house. Indifferent about wealth, but fascinated with the beauty and grace of the Lady Elinor, the young man gave himself up to the control of a passion as intense as it was unelfish, and proud of his conquest, hastened to introduce the old baronet to his intended daughter.

Little did Walter Lassell dream of the consequences, when with a flush of gratification, he saw his father—a very handsome man, yet in the prime of life—bow gallantly over the hand of the lovely girl, while with the eye of a connoisseur, he glanced at face and figure with a look of evident gratification. Still more pleased was Walter, when he saw his betrothed exerting herself to entertain their guest, and not until doubt was no longer possible, would he believe that under those smiles lurked deception of the cruellest kind; that she whom he had so loved was playing him false.

At dinner Lady Elinor appeared in the gayest spirits; she laughed, she talked, she rallied Walter and argued playfully with her father. At last the conversation changed, and “the all-powerful passion” became the theme. Some doubted its existence, some sneered at it; Walter warmly proclaimed his belief in it, Lady Elinor as warmly her incredulity.

“It is a mystery to me, even if it does exist,” she exclaimed, with a laugh that sounded very strangely to her betrothed; “an unfathomable mystery, and I hate mysteries. And to show how little I believe in its influence, I would marry any one who would keep me a coach and four.”

“I will take you at your word, Lady Elinor,” exclaimed Sir Richard, bowing low.

The lady blushed; and Walter Lassell rose from the table and left the room. Six months after, Sir Richard led the Lady Elinor to the altar, and his son joined Lord Wellington’s army on the continent.

Such a marriage could scarcely be expected to end happily. Fully aware of the mercenary motives that induced his wife to accept his hand, Sir Richard felt under no obligations to bestow on her more than the wealth she had stipulated for. This, it is true, he lavished with a prodigal hand. Lady Elinor wore the most costly dresses, adorned her beautiful figure with almost Eastern magnificence, possessed jewels a queen might have been proud to wear, had the richest liveries in London, and was the owner of a “coach and four” surpassing her most extravagant wishes; and yet Lady Elinor was not happy. Golden fetters are fetters still, and bitterly did the repentant woman contrast the misery that was with the happiness that might have been, the loving confidence of her deceived suitor with the jealous espionage of her suspicious husband. Sir Richard soon wearied of his beautiful, haughty wife, and always reminded of the treachery he had practised on his son by her presence, he gradually withdrew from her society, and when they met, scenes, the very reverse of agreeable, were sure to ensue. But when, twelve months after their marriage, the tidings came that Walter had fallen in battle, nothing could exceed the paroxysms of passionate grief into which Sir Richard was thrown. In furious language he reproached his now humbled wife with being the cause of his son’s death; with the wildest despair, he called on Walter to forgive him, to come home and receive his blessing; and at last gave himself up to moody sorrow, refusing consolation, and delighting in utter solitude.

The first event that roused Sir Richard from his despair was the birth of a son, whom he welcomed with some return of his former joyousness. To Lady Elinor, also, the little Richard was a source of joy and hope, her husband having evinced more kindness after the birth of the child than he had shown for many months.

Time passed, and a daughter was added to the family; not to increase its comfort, however, for the little Elinor failed to win her father’s love in the degree her brother had done; and the mother’s health being in a declining state, she was sent away to the care of strangers, and Lady Elinor, unable to resist, bowed to the affliction and murmured not.

The little Richard was four years old when another daughter was added to the house of Lassell, and she, who for five wretched years had been its mistress, looked her last on earth, and was laid in the family vault beside Sir Richard’s first wife. From the hour of her death, her name never passed her husband’s lips. The gloomy old parlor, and the adjoining chamber in which her last days had been spent, he never entered again; and the babe for whose life she had given her own, was not allowed to come into his sight.

To superintend his household affairs and bring up his daughters, Sir Richard summoned a widowed cousin of his own, poor and hitherto neglected; but to none would he confide the education of the headstrong, passionate and evil-disposed boy, on whom all his hopes were centered.

From his infancy, young Richard was a tyrant—a terror to the servants, and the torment of his sisters. Petted and indulged by his doting father, while yet a child his will was law; and as years passed on, and the old baronet became feeble in mind and health, he gradually yielded up his authority into the hands of the heir, who was far from being as popular as his father had been.

Over his sisters Richard Lassell assumed complete control—not undisputed, however, for Mrs. Hayford would not calmly see the young girls she loved tyrannized over; but her remonstrances were met with insult or contempt, and the threat of having her charges removed from her care, made her cautious about rousing Richard's anger unless absolutely forced to do so.

When Caroline Lassell attracted the attention of the dissolute and libertine Lord Ravenscourt—whose mother had told him he had better marry and reform if he wished to save his life and reputation—Richard decided at once that she should marry him; but knowing from experience that the passionate and haughty girl was much more easily coaxed than forced to comply with his commands, he appealed to her love of splendor and luxury (the sins which had proved her mother's destruction), setting forth in dazzling array the numerous advantages such a position would give her, and working so forcibly on her vanity that when the noble lover made a languid proposal, it was at once accepted, and Caroline Lassell, young, beautiful, warm-hearted and impulsive, became the wife of a dissipated man of fashion, with damaged health, clouded reputation—to say the least—and a heart incapable of one generous emotion.

Lord Ravenscourt was rich; possibly because his fortune was so large and so strictly entailed that he could not very easily make away with it. Lady Ravenscourt, we have said, was warm-hearted and impulsive; if she bestowed affection on her husband, he was disgusted; her family were away, and to none of them was she very deeply attached; her feelings must have vent somewhere, and turned from the proper channels they took a wrong course, and Lady Ravenscourt became a dreadful flirt. Her splendid mansion was constantly filled with company, and she herself, if her conscience ever whispered that this was not the course she ought to have pursued, drowned the stings in fresh excitement.

Enough has been said in the conversation at the commencement of this story to show the position of Mary Lassell. Of very different tastes and inclinations from Caroline, she found more attraction in the humble virtues and unacknowledged talents of the obscure artist, Henry Marsden, than in all the glittering splendor that would await her as the wife of Lord Ravenscourt's cousin, and the mistress of one of the most magnificent establishments in England.

To describe Richard Lassell's rage when he learned that his sister had refused so unexceptionable an offer, would be impossible; and his feelings deepened into hatred as day after day he knew that the lovers met, that their marriage approached, and he was powerless to prevent it.

"Let them marry," said the old man, glad to get rid of a child he had never loved. "Let them marry, Dick; I don't want daughters about me any longer; and besides, your proud wife will be glad to know that the old mansion has no other mistress when she comes."

"But, father, he is poor, miserably poor; a mere adventurer; and she might have married Lord Ravenscourt's cousin, the best match in England, to-day."

"I don't like Lord Ravenscourt," said the old man, crossly. "He insulted me the last time he was here, and I shall not forget to tell him of it when he comes again, a saucy puppy. If Mary wants to marry the painter, let her. He must support her till I am gone, and then she shall have the same fortune as her sister."

"Never!" was Richard's thought as he left the room to hold that conversation with his sister, the conclusion of which we have already seen.

"Come here and sit beside me, Mary, and watch this beautiful sunset."

The young wife was bending over him in an instant; one soft hand laid on his pale brow, and her trembling fingers on the feeble pulse.

"You're stronger to-night, Henry, are you not?"

"I feel better; much better than I have felt for many days. But what is the matter, darling?—you have been weeping. Has your father written to you?"

"No, Henry, my father is ill; but Richard answered my letter."

"And, as usual, has added fresh insult to the many we have already received from him."

Henry Marsden spoke angrily, and the excitement brought the fever flush to his cheek and a bright light in the sunken eye.

"My husband, you will injure yourself," exclaimed the anxious wife, as she took the upraised hand in her own, and gently drew the flushed cheek close to her bosom. "Why need we be angry with Richard? Surely, he deserves our pity. His cruelty will certainly be rewarded at some period, and from his heart he will repeat of the evil he has done."

"You are right, Mary; it is not for me to say aught ill of any on earth—I who have need to make my own peace with Heaven. But for you, my precious wife, I feel deeply these cruel blows; you, whom I have robbed of every joy, whose young life I have clouded, and whom I have subjected to unnumbered insults."

"I have often asked you never to speak such desponding words, never to add to my distress by alluding to the past. What have I known of happiness in this world that is not owing to you? Has not a world of bliss been spent in the few short years of our union? And now if it please God to part us, and give you rest sooner than he wills to take me, my own, do you not leave me a precious comforter in our darling Harry?"

"You are my good angel, Mary, and our boy is and will be all you could wish him. See him now; how joyously he springs about among the flowers! Draw back the curtain, darling, and let me look at him as long as I can." And the dying father gazed with unutterable feelings on the merry sports of his beautiful child.

The last rays of the setting sun were piercing through the tall trees that sheltered the humble cottage, casting streaks of gold on flowers and child, and parents. Without, all looked brilliant and bright; within, the shadows of twilight were closing around the sick bed, and as the young wife sat in painful thought, she pictured the change a few short days might make; and not even the gay laughter of her child, who had pushed aside the clustering roses from the window, and was showing his hands full of tempting fruit, could win a smile or cheerful word.

"Would that I might hope to see my boy grow up," sighed the invalid, as he leaned wearily back in his chair and pressed his hand to his throbbing heart. "My boy, my noble boy!"

The heart-broken wife smothered her grief lest his anguish should be increased; and when, soothed by her gentle voice, he slumbered peacefully as a child, she sat patiently through the many hours, watching each breath with immovable, hopeless despair.

And this gentle, loving wife and mother was the object of Richard Lessell's direct hatred and dislike. Again and again he had cursed her for making so disgraceful a choice, for allying their family with that of a miserable artist, and only that day had he written the cruellest and most insulting of letters in answer to one she had sent her father, asking assistance in her fast gathering troubles for the sake of his grandchild, the beautiful boy he had never seen. Richard's answer to the touching appeal was an unmanly exultation over what he called "the beginning of her punishment." He scornfully told her that no "beggar's brat should ever have countenance or assistance from a Lessell; that she had forfeited all claim to be considered one of the family, and that in future her letters should be returned unread." It was a crushing blow to the heart of the poor anxious wife, fondly anticipating the means of restoring her husband to health.

"Italy might do much for him; here he will never be better." So said the physician, and the hope enabled Mary to conquer her pride and write home for assistance. The answer was heart-breaking, but still she did not quite despair.

"I will ask Caroline; she has thousands at her command. Surely, she cannot refuse to lend me a little." And under the influence of these feelings, she penned an affecting letter to her sister, stating her troubles, her poverty, and imploring her aid in behalf of her husband and child.

Lady Ravenscourt sat in her boudoir late one morning after Mary had despatched her last hope. The open letter and its envelop lay in her lap, and the lady was evidently affected by what she had read. Caroline felt unusually impressive this morning. She was in trouble herself; but, unlike her sister's, the troubles were all of her own making. She contrasted Mary's despairing love for her husband with her own criminal conduct towards Lord Ravenscourt; and as she again read over the impassioned sentences, the hot tears fell fast and heavily on the open letter. "Poor Mary! she little thinks that I can only sympathize with her through my love for a stranger." The door gently unclosed, and her husband entered the room.

He started violently as he beheld his wife's tear-stained face and the letter in her hand, and advancing, sarcastically exclaimed:

"Am I not to have the privilege of reading this most touching epistle, that has so deeply affected your ladyship?"

Caroline's first impulse was to prevent his having it; but second thought induced her to put it into his outstretched hand:

"Pshaw! a begging letter," he exclaimed, after reading it over carefully. "And so that amiable brother of yours refuses to help poor little Mary and her romantic-looking, poverty-stricken husband? Very unnatural of him, I must say, but no reason in the world why she should expect us to. I have a horror of poor relations myself, and have carefully avoided making any discoveries of the kind in my own family. I should advise you to do the same, and forget that such people as the Marsdens ever existed."

Poor Caroline had had her best feelings called in play by her sister's letter, and her husband's words sounded harsh and unfeeling; she was just in that humor when a kind, loving word would have brought her humble and penitent to his arms; but Lord Ravenscourt had too long accustomed himself to treat his wife with slighting indifference, too little studied her temper to understand its workings; and now, by his sarcasms and worldly advice, he destroyed the last hope of happiness between them.

He turned to Caroline, who was still weeping, and asked her if she was not afraid of spoiling her eyes. "You ought to be careful, really. Captain Duchesne is the most fastidious man on earth, and I am convinced that one glance at your face in the state it is in at present, would destroy your power over him forever. To me, of course, it is of no consequence how you look, as no one expects a man now-a-days to admire his wife; but if you value the opinion of others, just throw that precious scrawl into the fire and try to remove the exceedingly disagreeable traces it has left. At the same time I think Mrs. Marsden evinces a most commendable regard for her husband, and sets an example for you to follow."

The tears were gone—the pale cheeks flushed—the slight form drawn up proudly, and the dark eyes flashing with anger.

"Mary's husband deserves all her regard!"

"Possibly he does," said Lord Ravenscourt, with a sneer, and purposely overlooking the implied reproach. "Possibly he does; nevertheless, I doubt much if Mary would have forgotten her duty, let his conduct be what it might."

"Where little is given little can be expected in return," said Caroline, with apparent carelessness, but real confusion. "But my time is of too much consequence to-day to be spent in idle argument. If your lordship has no particular communication to make, I must beg to be excused, as it is time to dress."

"I have a 'particular communication' to make, and must request your ladyship to bestow on me a few minutes more of your exceedingly valuable time. But first, I wish to know if Capt. Duchesne is concerned in the plans to-day?"

"Certainly he is," said Caroline, with assumed boldness; "and I am at a loss to know how that can interest any one."

"It interests me, Lady Ravenscourt. I had no objections to make to your amusing yourself with an innocent flirtation, or even a dozen if it so pleased you—it did no harm, and relieved me from the necessity of being always at your side; but since you have been so imprudent as to give room for unpleasant remarks, and have had the effrontery to show openly your regard for Captain Duchesne, I think it time for me to interfere, and desire you to drop his acquaintance at once."

Lord Ravenscourt paused and looked at his wife as if expecting a reply; but she sat motionless, her head bowed, her hand partly shading her face. His anger increased at her seeming indifference, and he exclaimed, passionately:

"Why do you not speak? Have you nothing to say to this charge? Are you willing to obey?"

"Never!" was the answer, given in a tone of concentrated rage and shame, as the lady rose from her seat and swept out of the room.

"How is he, John? No worse, I hope?" exclaimed Richard Lassell, as he flung the reins of his smoking horses to the old servant, and springing to the ground, helped his companion to alight.

"He's alive yet, but going fast, the doctor says."

"Thank fortune, we are not too late. Come, Foster, there is not a minute to lose." And then as they passed up the hall and began to ascend the wide oaken staircase, Richard paused and again addressed his companion: "You remember exactly what I said, Foster? Enough to Mary to secure the will; not a farthing more."

"But a shilling will do that," said the lawyer.

"Then a shilling be it," was the impatient answer, and the two passed on and entered the chamber of the dying man.

Two hours after, Richard abruptly entered the chamber of his wife, the aristocratic Lady Julia. Very fair and beautiful the young mother looked, as she sat surrounded by her four lovely children; even Richard stopped an instant to gaze on the happy picture, ere he addressed his wife. Julia sat on a low, softly cushioned ottoman, the folds of her delicate silk wrapper falling gracefully around her. On her lap she held her infant boy, a tiny, delicate flower, demanding all her motherly care as well as the attention of the rosy-cheeked, matronly-looking nurse, now entertaining the little twin daughters of the house of Lassell, who viewed with jealous eyes their mother's fond caresses bestowed on the brother. Stretched on the carpet, at his mother's feet, his head supported on his hand, and his whole mind absorbed in a book, lay the noble boy in whom centered the hopes of two ancient houses.

Richard Lassell had come to summon the Lady Julia to the deathbed of the old Sir Richard.

And the old man died, and no one was near him but his dark-browed son and that son's beautiful young wife. The daughters who should have been there to receive the father's last blessing, were far away; one unconscious her last parent was expiring; the other, yielding to a sinful passion, flying from her husband with her guilty paramour.

Henry Marsden had looked his last on earth. His pale widow and his precious boy might call in vain. The loved voice no longer answered their fond inquiries; the hand that once would return their loving clasp with fervent warmth, now lay crossed on the pulseless heart; and Mary felt as she looked on the insensible clay before her, that her husband was no longer there. The world looked cold and cheerless to her, and she clasped her little Harry to her heart, exclaiming, "Gone—all gone; father, and sister, and husband! My boy, my darling boy, you alone are left to comfort your mother!"

It was a sad blow to Mrs. Marsden's hopes when her brother's lawyer came to announce the death of her father and her own unexpected poverty. "My poor old father, it was no fault of his; he would never have condemned his child to poverty!"

Mr. Foster had a message from the new Sir Richard, but so touched was he by the hopeless sadness of the widow that he hesitated to deliver it. Summoning courage at last, he said:

"Sir Richard bade me to say, madam, that this is but the fulfilment of part of his curse."

All her old pride came rushing back to Mary's heart, as taking her child by the hand, she said:

"Let him beware—I curse him not; but there are sorrows deeper than any I have yet known. Let him look to it, that the evil he has wished for me befall not himself."

Mr. Foster hastened from the house of mourning and distress, and made all speed to acquaint his patron with the success of his errand. He was admitted to the room where the new baronet was enjoying the society of his wife and children. Julia listened silently to the first part of his communication; she felt a deep interest in the discarded daughter, and to her the will had seemed both unjust and mysterious; but when the lawyer, with an anxious glance at the beautiful boy, who stood leaning on his mother's chair, and with hesitating speech repeated the widow's words, then the truth flashed on Julia's mind, and with a fearful scream, she flung her arms around her child.

In vain Sir Richard strove to pacify her, in vain he remonstrated on the folly of her conduct; she knew it all now, and the mother's heart told her that for such injustice and cruelty a fearful retribution must come. And come it did, with crushing power, bending the proud hearts to the dust—humbling the haughty ones until they laid prostrate beside their idols.

The babe was taken first. Calmly Julia beheld it draw its last little breath on earth; calmly she beheld it carried from her sight; and many wondered at her indifference, and all felt surprised that the little one, on whom she had bestowed so much careful love, should be so quietly parted with. But Sir Richard alone knew that her calmness was the calmness of despair, that the agonized mother strove to bear her sorrow with meekness, in the hope of averting still greater punishment. But again death entered their home, and one, and then the other of the twin sisters were taken.

The young heir alone remained, and as years passed on, and he grew in strength and beauty, even Julia dared to hope that the father's sin was expiated—that this one, their all, would be spared to her prayers.

Fourteen years have passed away, but we still find Mrs. Marsden and her son dwelling in the little secluded cottage, rendered dear to her by recollections of the past. Their home is humble, but poverty no longer threatens to overwhelm them; for in her sorest need, the widow had found kind friends and warm hearts.

An aged relative of her husband's had for many years been an inmate of their quiet home, repaying Mrs. Marsden's kindness to his little motherless and dependent grandchild by taking the place of tutor to her son. Mr. Leighton was far from rich, but his income, united with the little possessed by Mary, enabled them to live comfortably in their quiet way, and even indulge in what they considered the most precious of luxuries—books, music and flowers.

While Harry Marsden and Emily Leighton were yet children, their home was the abode of content and happiness, but at the time we resume our story, Harry had reached those years when the sports and amusements of the boy give place to the deeper feelings of the man. He no longer looked on Emily as the pet and playmate of his idle hours; but with the knowledge of his changed feelings for her, came the conviction that, in his present circumstances, to call her his own were an impossibility. Little wonder was it, then, that in secret he mourned over the wretched destiny that had condemned him to a life of poverty; for without friends or interest all hope of improving his fortune was vain.

In vain Mrs. Marsden spoke words of encouragement, or his kind old instructor advise him to renew his studies, he only assumed a false cheerfulness before them.

Emily Leighton was pained at the change in her old playfellow, and unconscious of the share she herself had in it, sought incessantly to find out and relieve the sorrow. Surprising Harry one day in her favorite arbor, by her innocent entreaties to be allowed to share his grief, she won all from him; his love, his poverty, his misery. Then reproaching himself for the anguish he knew such knowledge would bring to her gentle heart, he besought her "to forgive him and forget him." But Emily possessed strong, earnest feelings, and she instantly comprehended the danger to one of Harry's ambitious nature being crushed down in hopeless poverty. It was the impulse of the moment to refuse to comply with his request to forget him, to offer to share his obscurity, and with him to face poverty, misery, anything, so that he would but be comforted. And Harry, though his honorable pride forbade his taking advantage of her unworldliness, and uniting her fate with his, listened to her, and was, as she bade him be, comforted. That night he announced his intention of leaving home.

"Do not strive to detain me, dear mother," he said, seeing that she was about to remonstrate with him. "The world is large. I am young and strong. Surely, it is not for me to spend my life here in useless inactivity."

Mrs. Marsden looked imploringly at Emily, as if to ask her also to plead with him; but kneeling at her feet, with her arms fondly twined around her, the young girl joined her entreaties to his, imploring her not to deny his request.

"Let him go, dear mama; it is best for him to go; and I will try to console you in his absence."

"One day; I must have one day to consider," exclaimed the distressed mother; and she hastened to her own room to meditate in silence and solitude on the proposed parting.

Morning came, and the little family met with saddened countenances. On Harry's open brow the knowledge of his mother's sufferings had set deep lines of care, but a glance at his face sufficed to assure that he was resolved to follow up his resolution.

Mrs. Marsden was calm and deathly pale. With her the worst was over. She had resolved to part with her son, even should it be to place the ocean between them. The morning meal, usually so joyous, passed in silence; but ere they rose from the table a letter was brought in.

"From my brother!" exclaimed Mrs. Marsden, with an accent of astonishment, as she hastily broke the seal and glanced at the contents. Without another word, the paper fell from her hand, and she sank fainting into the arms of her son.

Deep joy that letter brought to the inmates of the cottage, yet not wholly unchecked by sorrow, for on Richard Lassell had the last blow fallen, and in an agony of grief and remorse he implored his sister to come to the bedside of his wife, now dying broken-hearted for the loss of her last earthly treasure. Not an instant was lost, and shortly Mary bent over the couch of the hitherto unknown sister.

"Your son!—where is he? I would see your son!" said the dying woman; and a messenger was despatched for Harry.

He came, and kneeling beside his aunt, listened to her last words with feelings of sorrow.

It was Lady Julia's wish that he should espouse the betrothed of his cousin, a wealthy and aristocratic maiden, who had dutifully consented to her friend's arrangements before, and was equally ready to do so in this instance. But not all the charms of the young lady, either personal or pecuniary, nor even his desire to gratify his aunt's last wishes, could tempt Harry to forget or forsake his own Emily.

The poor girl passed two wretched days at the cottage in most painful uncertainty as to the changes Harry's unexpected access to fortune might bring to her.

But the third day brought a letter from her lover; the fourth, her lover himself; and Emily then learned that in his prosperity Harry could not forget her who had so willingly and unselfishly offered to share his poverty.

Lady Julia lived but a short time after the arrival of her relations; and Sir Richard, a prey to remorse, and suffering the penalty of his bad passions, soon followed her to the tomb. Six months after the death of his uncle, the young heir, now Sir Harry Marsden, brought home his beautiful young bride, and all acknowledged that never had a fairer or more lovely mistress graced the halls of Lassell.

In the happiness of her children Mrs. Marsden was repaid for all the sorrows of her early years; or if a regret at times overshadowed her calm brow, it was that he, the beloved of her girlhood, was no longer near to share her joys.

Some four or five years after her return to Lassell, Mrs. Marsden was summoned to the death-bed of a stranger in the next town. "A foreigner," the messenger said she appeared to be, and he urged the lady to hasten if she would see her ere she died.

It needed no second glance to convince Mrs. Marsden that the emaciated, death-like form, stretched on the coarse bed of a village inn, was the once gay and beautiful Caroline Ravenscourt, the elegant and extravagant mistress of a splendid mansion, the envied wife of one of the richest of England's aristocracy.

In poverty and misery Caroline had come to her old home to end a life of sin and disgrace. Long had she been banished from her husband's recollection, and when a divorce had freed him from the dishonorable connection, Lord Ravenscourt was rather rejoiced than otherwise that once more his liberty was unimpaired.

His wife died in the home of her childhood, deeply repenting the evil course she had chosen for herself, and long afterwards, when earth and all its delusions was passing away from the grasp of her husband, he understood and felt bitter remorse for the unfeeling conduct that had driven his unfortunate wife to desperation.

LINES TO OUR "EAGLE" AND "ANCHOR."

WRITTEN JULY FOURTH, 1856.

BY LEUT. HOLM, U. S. N.

Hand-in-hand, in path of glory,
Noble youths, ye start to-day;
Marching to our patriot's story,
Fighting to our country's lay.

Though diverge the paths of glory,
Duty leads you on your way;
Yet the future 'll tell the story,
How you honor, Mar, obey.

Think upon thy sire, O army!
Many a bloody Indian fray;
Wave that banner proudly, navy!
Wave the banner both obey.

Swear! upon the swords you cherish—
Swear! the oaths you'll ne'er give—
Each to fight, or nobly perish—
Both defend this glorious day!

A YARN IN THE LONG BOAT.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

"ALL the starboardlines a-ho-oy! eight bells. Tumble up! tumble up, lads, and eat your lodgings while you have a slant!" roared a thundering voice at the forecabin scuttle, rousing the starboard watch from their forenoon slumbers, which they were enjoying with more than usual satisfaction, having been engaged in a spirited reefing-match all the previous night.

"What's the weather, matey?" asked my watchmate, Joe Grummet, in a sleepy tone, as he slowly poked his legs out of the forward hammock and began lazily coaxing them into a pair of man-of-war ducks.

"Weather, is it?" returned the voice from the scuttle. "Wal, it's cleared off cloudy, and we'll have a dry shower after a bit. It stands you chaps in to look sharp, or you'll lose yer grub, for it will be all hands to hoose to 'gallant masts inside of a week, to my thinking."

"What is it for dinner, Spikes?" queried a hungry youngster, preparing himself for a trip to the galley.

"Wal, young man, no account," continued the voice. "For the first course you'll probably have nothing, by way of a change; the same for the second course; and for desert your old favorite, stewed catharping legs cooked in tar."

The boy, grumbling and growling at the propensity of the "ables" to be "allers a chaffin' of him," made his way up the companion-ladder, and soon returned with a huge kid of salt horse and a bucket of biscuit, whereupon each man valiantly drawing his sheath-knife, the deck was speedily cleared of the enemy.

Dinner being completed, the next move on board every well regulated ship is to light the pipes and have at least two whiffs, before one bell gives the signal for turning to; but we were not destined to enjoy that luxury. Scarcely had the first match been scraped against the cover of a chest, when the voice of the chief mate roared through the scuttle to the tune of "All hands send down to 'gallant masts and furl the fo'sail."

Tumbling on deck, we found that the gale of the night before had completely subsided—what little air there was stirring being like paddy's hurricane, right up and down; but the horizon all about us had a particularly ugly look, giving promise of a snorter at no very distant period. For the next hour, all hands were busily enough employed running aloft, reefing mast ropes, swaying and lowering until the fore, main and mizzen topgallant masts and yards were safely deposited on deck, the foresail rolled snug in its gaskets, and nothing showing above the eyes of the topmast rigging.

We had scarcely executed these precautionary measures, before the gale came down upon us with a howl, striking us flat aback and deluging the deck with spray. The old boat staggered and keeled over almost on to her beam ends before the first fury of the blast; but righting herself with a shake, we managed, with a good deal of bracing and boxing about, to get her on the wind, where, being a light tea-loaded craft, she lay like a duck rising and falling on top of the waves, with her nose within six points of old Boreas's bellows nozzle. Our vessel not being officered by that description of "web feet" that usually command the "old barns of Neekers" hailing from down east by east, on board of which they keep the hands twisting foxes, or making spun yarn until thirty seconds before she goes down or pitches on to a lee shore, there was nothing for us to do but make ourselves as comfortable as circumstances would admit.

In pursuance of this laudable design, we—meaning the able seamen, or "shell-backs," as the present generation of packet-sailors delight to call themselves—having stationed the boys on deck to pass the word of command, if any should be given, proceeded to stew ourselves away in the covered long boat, where, sheltered from the spray and wind, we might light our pipes and luxuriate generally.

"I say, chaps," suddenly exclaimed an old wharf rat, who, having got his pipe fairly under way and seated himself upon a soft fender, had been for some minutes laboriously spelling in a half audible voice the words which he slowly traced with his great anchor stock of a fore finger across the columns of a dingy newspaper of the mature age of three years; "I say, chaps, whatever is this here gun cotton they blow so much about?"

"Why, bless your innocent heart! don't you know?" returned Tom Piper the boatswain, with an extensive grin. "It's a kind of cotton that grows in the island of Gun-sey, from which it takes its name, as well as from the fact that it makes tip top wadding for the canons of the church."

"That be blowed for a twister!" rejoined the seeker after knowledge with a contemptuous air. "You'd best calk up, Tom Piper, and not expose your ignorance. What you don't know would fill a book bigger than the 'ptome. But I say, Grummet, what is the stuff, any way? You know more than anybody else in the world, or pretend to, though there's one gentleman rope-hauler that's 'incredible on that pint,' as the cook says when you tell him there's wood in the lobskouse."

"Why," returned Joe, assuming a dignified air, as is customary with him when appealed to for his opinion, "this here gun cotton, d'ye mind, is a kind of stuff, you know, that's used for—for—that's used, d'ye see—" Joe, evidently at a loss in what manner to express himself, paused to discharge a mouthful of tobacco juice in among the naked toes of a youngster, who had crawled up on to the booms abreast of the opening in the waist of the long boat to hear what was going on. "This here gun cotton, d'ye understand," he resumed, seeing that the eyes of the entire watch were fixed inquiringly upon him; "this here stuff is just—is nothing more nor less than—than—why, some of you chaps have seen it, haint you?"

"Never!" they all responded, with a grin of delight at finding Joe taken aback.

"Why, it's simple enough," he continued, evidently perplexed beyond measure; "it's just the simplest thing in nature. The stuff, d'ye mind, is nothing more nor less, as I said before, than just gun cotton, and that's all about it."

"Why, do tell us!" exclaimed Tom Piper, in feigned astonishment. "What a thing it is to have larning, to be sure! Some of you sea lawyers set that right down in your log books, so's to be sure not to forget it."

"I s'pose you think I don't know what it is?" exclaimed Joe, angrily.

"Now just look a' that, mariners!" vociferated Piper. "D'ye ever hear tell of anything so wonderful? Besides all the rest of his knowledge and larning, he's a fortin-teller too, and knows what a chap is thinking about by just looking at his figure-head."

Joe was highly indignant at the peculiar style of conversation adopted by Piper, and making a strenuous effort to vindicate his reputation as a man of extensive general information, he succeeded, by taking an entirely new point of departure, after a good deal of circumlocutory backing and filling, in conveying a tolerably correct idea of the way in which gun cotton was made, and its use after being made.

"But," he continued more good naturedly, as he began to perceive himself regaining the ground he had lost, "cotton is not the only thing that can be prepared in the same way and used for the same purpose. Half a dozen sheets of paper, rigged out to go off like gunpowder, was the occasion of my drifting about for a couple of years all over the East Indies to no purpose, and coming within the twinkling of a topsail sheet block of getting my neck stretched out like a giraffe, with a hemp cravat slung to a Java Dutch gallows."

"Go in, lemons!" interrupted Piper encouragingly, stretching himself out on a heap of spare sails. "Heave ahead with your twister. I'd as soon listen to a lie from you as from any other hawser-laid, skysail ranger."

"The way of it was just here," continued Joe, without heeding the interruption. "About the time the stuff was first invented, I was laying in the port of Hong Keng, in the ship Starvation, Captain Blueblazes, rigged by the parish and provisioned on charity."

"By the tail of Mahemmed's big black bull terrier, I've sailed in that clipper the biggest part of the time since I was christened," ejaculated one of the watch with energy.

"And I!" "And I!" exclaimed the others.

"O yes, you may bet your wheelers on that, and no fear of losing your mane either," broke in Piper. "There was never that amphibious yet that ever twirled a marlin-spike, or had been on the drink as long as the old woman's son, who took a barrel of salt to Turk's Island as a venture, to swap off for tamarinds, oranges, lemerines and all-fired great kegs of molasses, and who had been gone just three long days come day after to-morrow, but would swear under oath—yes, under a number of oaths—that he had been shipmates with that craft."

"Look a here, Tom Piper," said Joe, fiercely. "Just you haul taut and belay that jaw tackle of your'n, will yer? or your slack braced wit may carry away your brains in the slings."

"O, heave ahead, heave ahead, my dandy!

Don't be such a lubber as to get alarmed because you happen to strike soundings."

"No fear of my hair turning gray with fright from any of the no-sailor soundings that come from you, my bold dog. But let me see—where was I?"

"I don't wonder you forget," responded Piper with a grin. "It's an old saying that a certain class of people need to have excellent memories. But go on, go on—don't shorten sail, or you may slip your wind."

Without paying any attention to this speech, further than to slightly elevate his proboscis, Joe proceeded:

"O yes, I have it. I was lying at Hong Kong—"

"Not the slightest doubt of that, Joe, and in my humble opinion, you've been lying ever since you left there, and before too, for that matter."

"Look a here, Tom Piper!" shouted Joe, springing from his seat in a fury. "D'ye know what it is to have your head caved in?"

"No, I don't—and I never was shipmate with but one man who I think could do that trifling job, and that chap is Joe Grummet," he returned good humoredly; for although Piper loved a joke as well as the next man, he was nevertheless a prime good fellow at bottom—and top too, not to favor one section at the expense of another, as is the custom with some politicians.

Considerably mollified by the compliment, Joe resumed his seat and his temper, and took up his pipe and the thread of his discourse.

"Well, as I was saying, we had laid at the port of Hong Kong some considerable time, and I was getting heartily sick of the old boat. Blueblazes was a regular drunken old tyrant, who kept the ship in continual hot water, and nothing but squabbling, swearing and fighting was going on from morning till night. I should have left the vessel long before, but for the fear of being some time out of employ, for ships were scarce and sailors plentiful at the time, so that the chances for getting another craft were extremely slender. It happened one afternoon—the captain being on shore—that we knocked off work and cleared up the decks quite early, and having nothing better to do, I went over into a bumboat that had come alongside and made fast to our fore chains.

"Among numberless other curiosities, the bumboat woman had a lot of this explosive paper, which tickled me exceedingly, it being the first thing of the kind I had ever seen; so returning on board, I forthwith appropriated enough ship's biscuit to pay for half a dozen sheets, which I stowed away in my chest for future use. It was my anchor watch that night from twelve till one, during which time the captain came off from the shore, noisy and quarrelsome, and with his skin about as full of poor liquor as it could well hold. With some little difficulty, I managed to hoist him on deck, lug him into the cabin, and tumble him into his berth, where he lay helpless on his back, shouting, swearing, and vainly endeavoring to get up for the purpose—as he said—of getting his pistols to shoot me. He soon fell asleep, however, and I resumed my pacing round the deck, to see that the ship didn't fall overboard. In the discharge of this important duty, half an hour passed away, by which time I began to feel decidedly sleepy, to have longing thoughts of my hammock, and to wish that I was snugly coiled away in the comfortable old dream-bag. So going softly into the cabin, to ascertain if it was not almost one o'clock, I was then and there struck with a bran new idea that at once rendered me as wide-awake as a New York pick-pocket.

"Captain Blueblazes was a great and most industrious smoker. At no time, and upon no occasion, did he consider his pipe unseasonable. Indeed, it was scarcely ever out of his mouth; and I had repeatedly seen him asleep in bed with the pipe-stem clenched between his teeth. In order to have everything convenient for the gratification of this propensity, he had caused to be attached to the mizzen-mast, which was near the door of his state room, a small spirit-lamp constantly burning, a box of tobacco, and a tumbler containing papers of twisted paper, such as are seen on the mantel piece of almost any house. As my eye lighted upon these last, it occurred to me that some of my explosive paper, made up in the same form, would pass muster very well as the original tapers, and perhaps startle old Blueblazes a bit when he prepared for his morning smoke. Full of this idea, I went back to the forecabin, cut one of the sheets into slips and speedily twisted up fifteen or twenty very respectable tapers. With these in my hand, I forthwith returned to the cabin, abstracted the contents of the tumbler, and substituted my own manufactures in their place. So far, all was well enough; but in turning to go out, I stumbled over a piece of ill luck in the shape of a belt of canvass, and came down spat on the deck.

"'Who's that?' roared the captain, making an ineffectual effort to leap out of his berth. 'I see you, Joe Grummet, you bloody rascal! Wait till morning, and I'll set up your rigging for ye, my lad, with a taut lanyard.'

"It was now too late to undo my work, for the first mate, whose state-room was directly opposite the captain's, was awakened by the noise, and would have observed me; so going back again to the fore-castle and awakening the man whose watch it was, I turned into my hammock and snoozed away like a night policeman until four o'clock next morning, when the second dickey came forward to rouse all hands to wash decks.

"Buckets and brooms were now of course the order of the day, and as the head pump was out of order, it was necessary to draw the water over the side. I was the one that usually attended the whip, while the others passed the water and wielded the brooms. In order to more readily observe the result of my last night's mischief, I made fast the tail block for the whip to the main brace pennant, directly opposite one of the cabin windows, where I could overlook all that transpired within. It was nearly two bells before old Blueblazes exhibited any symptoms of turning out. At length, with a snort and a kick, he slowly swung his legs out of the berth, rubbed his eyes a minute, and going to the mast, deliberately filled his pipe and taking one of my tapers, applied it to the lamp. With a bright flash, it vanished from his grasp, and while with dilated eyes he stared with astonishment at the ends of his fingers, where the taper but a moment before had been, the entire bunch in the tumbler became by some means ignited, shooting a broad flame directly into his face, singeing his hair and whiskers in a deplorable manner. I had not foreseen such a result as this; affairs began to wear a serious aspect. With a roar like a bull, the captain sprang for his pistols—

"O you infernal villain—you bloody scoundrel, Joe Grummet you! I'll fix ye for this!" he yelled, as he placed caps upon the weapons.

"I was too well aware of the reckless character of this man to allow him to get hold of me until the first fury of his rage had abated; so dropping the bucket overboard, lanyard and all, I dove forward to the fore-castle, and hastily divesting myself of the only two articles of wearing apparel I considered it necessary to wear in that climate, sprang from the bow and struck out vigorously for the shore. But I was not destined to reach it that trip. A quarter-boat was instantly lowered from the ship, and pulled by the officers—for the men would not touch an oar. I was speedily overtaken, fished up and conveyed on board, where, loaded with abuse from the captain—whom the first and second mates deprived of his pistols—I was heavily ironed and thrust into the lazarets, in which pleasant apartment, with no other clothing than the airy jacket and trousers furnished me by that tight-fitting tailor, Nature, I had abundance of leisure to reflect upon my delightful predicament.

"Having cut up such a shine as that, it was of course for my interest to desert at the earliest possible moment, as I could look for nothing but ill usage and vengeance from the captain; but he took the best of fine care that I should have no opportunity for putting in practice anything of the kind. I was detained a close prisoner on board until the ship sailed, which event occurred about three weeks after the affair of the tapers, when, as there was no possibility of my getting away, I was allowed to return to my regular duty. The treatment I received, after getting to sea, won't bear thinking of. You all know the fate of a man, when the officers are "down on him."

"Our next port of destination, after leaving Hong Kong, was Batavia, where we arrived after five weeks beating down the China Sea, against the monsoon. Shortly after dropping anchor, we were visited by several Dutch officials in regard to some ship business. We were at the time busily employed cleaning and painting the ship, inside and out; and in order the more readily to perform this service for the fore-castle, all our chests and hammocks had been brought up on deck. When the Dutchmen made their appearance on board, I was slung in a bowline over the bluff of the bow, painting one of the ports. Feeling an inclination to solace myself with a bit of the 'filthy weed,' I thrust my claws into my pockets and pulled out a couple of large handfuls of nothing—a commodity with which I am generally pretty well supplied. So shinning up the bowline, I crawled inboard, to procure the desired refreshment.

"Seated upon my chest, I found a heavy Dutchman, talking with an unknown tongue in the German language to another heavy Dutchman seated upon another chest. With the utmost politeness of tone and manner that I could command, I requested him to slue himself a bit, so that I could come at what I wanted. With a scowl, as though I had taken an unwarrantable liberty in addressing him at all, he rose, and I proceeded to fish out from the bottom of the chest a day's allowance of tobacco. I had accumulated a good many traps of one kind and another, so that the old box was pretty well filled, and could only be closed by crowding. Upon the top of all, lay the five remaining sheets of explosive paper, together with some pipes and loose matches. Seeing the captain coming forward, I hastily dropped the lid and sprang on to the topgallant forecandle to go to my work—the Dutchman seating himself as before. I can only account for the occurrence that immediately ensued by supposing that when the Dutchman seated himself upon the chest, thereby crowding the cover down, sufficient friction was caused to ignite the matches, which communicated to the confounded paper; for scarcely had I reached the knight-heads when a tremendous explosion took place, and looking back, I had the melancholy satisfaction of seeing the Dutchman and the lid of my chest flying together in the air, at an elevation of some twelve or fifteen feet from the deck, while the forecandle was strewn with my unlucky traps and shattered fragments of the chest.

“Murder, donder and blitzen!” roared the unfortunate representative of the Batavian government, as he came down spunk on to the deck. ‘That bloody assassin try to murder me, captain!’ he exclaimed in a fury, pointing to me and rubbing his legs.

“O you precious highbinder!” yelled old Blueblazes, with a grin of gratified malice. ‘That’s your game—is it? You want to blow up another man—don’t you? We’ll put a tant seizing on your pranks for the future, you son of a hangman’s slip-noose!’ and grabbing a short capstan bar, he fetched me such a clip on top of my brain-bucket as to drive all my senses clear down into my boots.

“I must have lain some time insensible, for when I again came to myself, I was laying on the grating at the gangway, with the irons on my waists, and a file of soldiers and an officer standing near me. So soon as I was able to stand upon my feet, they hustled me over the side into a boat, and pulled for the shore, upon reaching which I was marched, closely guarded by the soldiers, to the prison, shoved into a seven-by-nine cell, and the key turned upon me. All that day I was rather stupid and confused from the effects of the blow, and consequently troubled myself but little as to what was to be the upshot of the matter. Being conscious of having entertained no malice whatever, I had no idea that anything serious could come of it; but I was fated to be woefully undeceived in this particular.

“Bright and early next morning my cell door was unlocked, and a soldier entering, motioned me to follow him. Proceeding along a number of dimly lighted passages, we came at length to a large room where were assembled half a dozen stolid looking Dutch justices, old Blueblazes, the blown up official, and several other gentlemen whose principal employment seemed to be to look alternately at me and each other, shake their heads, and look at me again. The Dutchman was called upon for his testimony, which he gave at great length, but being in the Dutch language, I could not understand a word of it. It must, however, have been a very glowing account of the affair, for the judges evidently looked upon me as a monster of iniquity. Blueblazes next took the stand, and with a sardonic grin proceeded to give a detailed account of how the prisoner, while lying at the port of Hong Kong, had in the night time while he (the captain) was sleeping the sleep of innocence and fancied security, feloniously entered the cabin and deposited beneath his berth several kegs of gunpowder, with the evident design of blowing the ship and all that it contained into the air, but being interrupted by the awakening of himself and the mate, he (the prisoner) had delayed firing the train until the next morning, when providentially but a small portion became ignited; and although he himself had been seriously injured, he had, out of the mistaken kindness of his heart, forgiven me, hoping I would repent of my errors. But the affair of the previous day had convinced him that I was incorrigible, and a blood thirsty villain, whom the law would err in lightly punishing. He then gave his version of the Dutchman’s affair, stating that while that respectable official was quietly seated upon the chest, I had approached, lighted a slow match, and hastily retreated to escape the terrific explosion that almost instantly ensued, and which was evidently intended to cause the official aforesaid to shuffle off his mortal coil with great and most unpleasant celerity.

“At this stage of the proceedings, I sprang to my feet, greatly excited, and denied ‘under oath’—as Tom Piper says—the whole story. At a motion from one of the judges, I was immediately seized by the soldiers and forced back into my seat; but I still continued to use my lungs, and demanded to see the American consul. This could not well be refused me, and that gentleman being sent for, soon after made his appearance. But it is needless to tell chaps of your experience what satisfaction a sailor gets from an American consul, in a foreign port. Indeed, that consul would be considered as dangerously insane, who should take the part of a friendless sailor, against the captains and ship-owners who support him, and whose influence continues him in office.

“The consul heard my statement of the case with a scowl of incredulity; then listened to the captain’s story with a smile, said he had no doubt I was a great rascal, shook old Blueblazes by the hand, invited him to dine with him, and departed. Dutch justice is speedy in its course, particularly as regards sailors, jury trials being dispensed with as an unnecessary duty and expense. One of the judges rising from his seat, ordered me to stand up, which I did with a bounce. He then proceeded to inform me that, for having attempted the life of an official of the Batavian government, I was sentenced to thirteen years' hard labor in the chain gang. I was then conducted back to my cell and locked up for safe keeping.

"This cell was very small, with thick stone walls, and but one small grated window placed high above my reach. The suffocating heat of such a small apartment, under a tropical sun, was almost intolerable. My health soon began to suffer from the close confinement and bad air, my spirits became much depressed, and my mind was filled with gloomy imaginings. While in this condition, and when I had been imprisoned something more than three weeks, I was awakened about midnight, one night, from a sort of half slumber, by a sound as of some one knocking lightly or tapping against some part of my cell.

"What's that?" I exclaimed, starting up and gazing about me, for the sound seemed to be inside the walls.

"There was nothing to be seen. I was about to lay down, when the sound came again, apparently directly over my head. Instantly the recollection of the spiritual rappings, of which I had heard so much, flashed into my mind, and I faltered, in trembling tones:

"Are there any spirits present?"

"Tap, tap, tap," came the sound again, now in a different place.

"I assumed as firm a voice as I could command, and said in quite a loud tone:

"If the spirit wishes to communicate with me, will it please make it manifest by giving three raps?"

"Hold your tongue, you bloody fool, can't ye? and don't be rousing the guard," responded a muffled voice, which was clearly outside the window.

"Mighty civil kind of a spirit that! and if my harkers aint out of order, it's the ghost of Jack Brace, my old bunk mate," said I to myself, speedily regaining my courage at the sound of a human voice.

"And hopping up on to a table that the cell contained, from the window I saw at a distance below several dark figures moving about among the rank tropical undergrowth, while one, with a long stick in his hand, was performing the part of a spirit by tapping the wall to attract my attention.

"Who's there?" I asked, in a strong whisper.

"It's your shipmates, you thundering old pelican. We've come to get you out, but the window is too high for us. D'ye think you could do anything to those bars, if you had the tools?" responded the voice.

"Sartin," I replied; 'pass up the instruments.'

"In a second, a three-cornered file came whizzing through the grating and struck into one of my cheeks—you can see the scar there now. It was no time to stop for trifles, however; so pulling it out, I mounted the little table abovementioned, and by which I could just reach the bars, and went to work with such a will that in twenty minutes one of the bars was removed, and I was on the ground with both ankles sprained by the fall. My shipmates had arranged everything. A boat was to start immediately for Manilla, on board of which I found my chest nicely patched up, with all my traps and a tarpaulin contribution of twenty dollars inside, and by sunrise, I was several miles at sea and out of the reach of old Blueblazes.

"I'd like to catch the old scoundrel on shore about ten minutes," continued Grummet, after a short pause.

"What would you do to him, Joe?" asked Tom Piper.

"Do to him?" responded Grummet, gritting his teeth and clenching his fists. "I'd treat him with kindness, so's to heap coals of fire on his head, and try if it wouldn't warm up his drunken old brains a bit."

The sound of eight bells striking, put an end to our yarn spinning and sent us aft to "Call the watch, hold the reel, Pump ship, and relieve the wheel."

SELLING A GOSSIP.

"Have you heard the story about number 288?" inquired the facetious Mr. C., addressing his fun-loving neighbor, B.

"No, I have not," replied B; "let us have it."

"It is too gross," remarked B., hesitatingly.

"O, never mind, I can stand it; let me have it by all means," eagerly exclaimed B.

"I tell you it is too gross."

"All the better, it will just suit me; I like such jokes; just shut the door there and let me hear it."

"Can't do that, for G. stands there listening to hear me sell you."

"Well, if you're going to sell me, I should like to know how you're going to do it. Let's hear what your 288 is that's too gross."

"You have heard it twice already," replied C., with a grin. "I tell you 288, being twice 144, is too gross.—Life Illustrated."

WAITING.

BY WILLIE L. FABOR.

The shadows gather darker tints,
That drape the green, embowered road
That leads to Cecile's sweet abode—
A road my footstep often prints.

I know the gate all open swings—
I know that 'neath the maple tree
Before that gate—she waits for me,
Amid the summer's blossomings.

She waits for me! though thought be swift,
Yet swifter shall my footstep speed,
Until at Cecile's feet I plead,
A suppliant for a life-long gift.

THE MYSTERIOUS PLEDGE.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

A MISERABLE, worthless fellow!"

"Hush! there goes his sister, Alice."

Alice Wentworth heard; let any affectionate young heart imagine such epithets bestowed—deservedly—on the object dearest to it in the world, and sympathize with the poor girl. She felt dizzy and suffocating, whirling through the air rather than walking on the ground. With instinctive desire to escape listening to further stigmatizing of her unfortunate brother, she almost ran past the village store; afterwards slackening her pace as suddenly, for the person on whose account she suffered was preceding her homeward, and only too visibly in a violent, unapproachable mood.

Allston Wentworth was the twin brother of Alice; they had been orphans several years, and their parents left no children besides themselves. The brother and sister were fondly attached to each other; in earlier life each had seemed necessary to the other's daily existence. Their meeting, when both had completed their studies, to return together to the home of their childhood, was a joyful occasion joyfully anticipated. All the village were delighted, too, at seeing the sweet cottage down by the brookside re-opened at length; and they may be pardoned for the pride they felt in the young proprietors. Allston had graduated with distinction, he possessed every personal advantage; Alice was the perfect answering of an angel mother's prayer.

Old acquaintances and friends as they dropped in one by one to welcome them back, never failed to comment with satisfaction on the growth of the place, and its increase in business during the period of their absence. Gentle Miss Wentworth did not gainsay what she heard so often repeated; yet all the while she was silently analyzing facts, and questioning whether the change referred to, could in truth be termed a progress.

Mr. Coggles's former small store of dry goods and miscellaneous articles presented an imposing new front—all very fine, till we come to consider the enlargement as in order to establish a liquer-selling department; it was the profit of this department which had shortly enabled its proprietor to lay through a field of his a new street that received his name, and grace the same with some half a score of pleasant looking, though shammiily constructed dwellings, advertised—"For sale or to let." Families flocked in like martens to a box in spring; and it is doubtful if all acted with nobler forethought than the birds. Many of these new-comers had no regular employment for themselves, but together they furnished a business finely lucrative to their landlord at his bar.

Yes, it did have a thriving aspect, so considerable a number of teams belonging to every quarter of the town, and adjacent towns drawn up at sunset around the store; but if the illusion was to be preserved, one must not sit up to mark at what hour or with how steady hands, those teams were driven away homeward.

Tracing the stream to the fountain head, Alice was speedily convinced that the waters, however grateful they might appear, would prove bitter to as many as tasted. Alas! the sister of Allston was doomed to feel the correctness of her judgment.

At college the young man had somewhat relaxed in principle, had been what is called "a little wild." He numbered at the wine parties in the students' rooms—that is, during the last year of his course; and at certain other midnights would have been in no danger of losing his life had the buildings taken fire and consumed over the heads of the gravely dreaming professors.

It was only having a little "fun;" that fun was missed when he got beyond it. With all the love he felt for his sister, home was found insufferably dull; the ready resource was accepted. Evening by evening saw him at the general rendezvous—Mr. Coggles's store.

At first he scarcely more than passed a couple of hours, relating anecdotes and laughing at those he heard, with the more respectable class of the assembly; retiring quite early—that is to say, by ten o'clock, and with no other mark of the peculiar influence of the place than a slightly scented breath.

In vain Alice exercised all her sisterly arts to win him from temptation and ruin; he persisted in his chosen course, and descended by rapid gradations. She was left to her loneliness more and more ; and whatever portion of his time he had spent at home, Allston in his present estate was little companionable. A tree with the fire of intemperance burning at the root, his beautiful foliage was fast withering, his tender and graceful branches falling with the seething away of the life sap.

As a measure to effectually intimidate his sister from entreaties and expostulations, he assumed towards her a bearing rigid and distant ; coming and going without salutation or adieu, and sitting moody and reserved over their meals together. The oldtime affection, the gaiety, the mutual confidences were on his part repudiated and repelled. In a year from the time of their return, the walls within which the children drew their first breath, and the parents their last, had been desecrated by the entrance of the promising student with the mumbling lip, idiotic eye and lurching gait of the drunkard.

To one his example served as a warning and a summons. At the giving way of the ice beneath his feet, Henry Clifton, long a familiar and devoted friend to Allston, retreated in time to save himself ; stretched an earnest hand to assist the perilled, and raised a cry of alarm to the throng rushing headlong on in the same track.

Clifton, two or three years the senior of Allston Wentworth, had lately succeeded to his father's practice in the town as a physician ; hitherto he had been exceeding popular among all classes, both as a citizen and in his profession ; but when he drew up a temperance pledge and right eloquently pressed men to give it their signature, he heard himself branded " fanatic " on every hand, and met everywhere sneers and contempt.

He suddenly had plenty of leisure ; his horse grew fat in the stall, and may have thought his master was permitting him in a mass the several Sabbaths on which he had carried him the round of his patients before. Doctor Thompson and Waitt, from neighboring towns, both liberal patronizers of Mr. Coggles's bar, as often as they came that way, divided his practice between them.

But Clifton was stanch ; he held aloft the standard in the face of the enemy, and gradually a few, a very few, rallied around it. Others longed to do the same, but the fetters of the tyrant upon them were too strong to be broken at will. Allston's motto had been " No danger ! " it was changed to " No deliverance ! " His ambition and energy of purpose seemed dwindled away ; he nearly judged himself unworthy of manhood, and felt wholly unequal to moral contest. Clifton labored indefatigably for his salvation, and found in the beautiful though mournful eyes of Alice turned upon him in gratitude, an exceeding great reward.

It was a raw, November twilight ; Alice closed the cottage and walked up past the store where her brother was certain to be ; not with any definite idea concerning him, but because the solitariness of her home was unendurable and her feelings led her that way. She had turned and was retracing her sad steps, when Allston was seen to hurl himself out at the door of the store followed by gusty jeers. He half-turned, shook his clenched right hand with a wordy defiance ; then with unsteady step went away homeward, gesticulating to himself, and muttering like the north wind that swept across the hill.

One of a group of loungers at the outer angle of a fence just by, gazing after Allston, spoke of him as miserable—worthless ; and a companion hushed him out of respect to Miss Wentworth, as told at the beginning of our story. They, as yet in the remote circles of the maelstrom, never conceived of danger to themselves ; nor considered that the sinking victim whom they contemplated with scorn and disgust, was shortly since in this same higher degree.

Disension comes out of intemperance, as the enormous serpent Python was bred in the slime of the earth. That afternoon the fast horse Niagara, which Wentworth lately bought for a large sum, had trotted for a purse with Prairie Mare, owned by the captain jockey of the county. The latter had won. The prize was but small, and in itself no matter of importance to Niagara's master, who, if he was not immensely rich, had only to spend six cents in order to believe so ; but he had boasted and his comrades had betted, therefore to be defeated in the trial was extremely unpleasant and mortifying.

All hands returned to Coggles's, and while they unsparingly " refreshed," the triumphant jockey purposely irritated his competitor by repeated taunts, which members not involved relished quite too well for Wentworth's liking. He at length launched forth general anathemas, and accused the judges of the race of falsifying in his disfavor. This excited a storm of hisses and gibes, when the subject was fortunately moved upon to quit the scene, which he did.

Alice followed her brother home ; as she entered the hall, he with a candle in his hand reached the head of the staircase and passed round the balustrade to his own chamber. His unusually early return suggested illness ; but she could venture no intermeddling. Retiring shortly to her chamber, which was next her brother's, she sat for an hour listening for some token from him; then, re-assured by the continued quiet, she offered a prayer for him, strong in desire though weak in faith, and closed her tearful eyes on the pillow.

Next morning, Allston awoke impressed by a dream, as he thought. It seemed that in the middle of the night his mother appeared in the room, clad in white, took from a table at the head of his bed a small Bible which always lay there—her dying gift, and inscribed on a fly-leaf with his name in her own hand—and turning fall towards the bed, said, solemnly:

"My son, you have again and again refused to sign the pledge, which alone can save you. I am come to perform the act for you, which you have not the courage to perform for yourself. Here I will write a pledge and annex it with your name."

She opened the book at the first fly-leaf and wrote. The motion of her hand, defined to the son intently looking on, every word as it was penned.

"PLEDGE.—By this volume twice sacred, as the Word of Holiness and the best token of a mother's love, I do herewith declare that I will taste intoxicating liquors no more while I live.
"ALLSTON WENTWORTH."

She closed the Bible and restored it to its place, looked again upon him with an angel's smile, and disappeared.

The particulars, faintly recollected at first, came presently back with bewildering distinctness. Without designing it, Allston thrust forth a hand from beneath the coverlid and grasped the little Bible. Many weeks he had foreborne to open it, for the last time he did so, it said to him—"Look not thou on the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." This doctrine was troublesome to him, so the volume containing it was put permanently aside.

Now he lifted the cover, and, transfixed with astonishment, beheld the realization of his dream. There was the pledge in exact simile of his mother's chirography; the most careful comparison would fail to discover between it and the inscription upon the opposite page, any difference save that, while the last was faded and half-effaced by time, the first looked fresh and scarce dry from the pen.

Half an hour later, as Dr. Clifton was pulling some late vegetables in his garden, Allston advanced to the wall which divided their grounds, and leaning upon it accosted him:

"Have you the pledge in your pocket this morning, Henry? I believe you commonly carry it about you?"

The person addressed started upright from his employment, and after a moment, slowly approached the speaker with eyes fixed upon his face, searching whether some expression there did not contradict the strange sincerity of his tones.

"Yes, I have it," he at length replied.

"Because," rejoined Allston, "I am now ready to sign it—though it can make no difference with me."

In speechless wonder the doctor produced the paper; the other was prepared with pen and ink; the pledge was returned with the signature of Allston Wentworth, traced as boldly as Hancock's upon the Declaration of Independence—and, truly, such a declaration it was to him. He then turned and walked calmly and firmly back to the cottage.

Thenceforward in the moral sentiment of the place there was a perceptible change. The foul weed was not immediately plucked up by the roots, but it was mown down; and the bare stump which alone rose above the ground, with the strong sunlight of truth and conscience falling on it, slowly withered. The combined influence of two such men as Clifton and Wentworth, wisely exerted, could not fail of being ultimately potent.

Through them manufactures were established in the village, providing an increasing population with remunerative labor; also a store, furnished them the necessities of life away from the poison which induces misery and death. Men whom Mr. Coggles had, by the temptation he set before them, and the merciless foreclosure of mortgages in all instances possible, reduced from comfort to wretchedness, began substantially to thrive again. The lyceum and social temperance meeting succeeded to gatherings at the dram shops.

The vender of ardent spirits finding his customers few, and these chiefly of the non-paying class; and, moreover, himself grown more obnoxious in the community than even the earliest opponent of the traffic had been, took the sum of his ill-gotten gains—being much smaller than he had hoped to make it—and retired upon a farm in another township.

But in this I have anticipated.

Three weeks subsequent to signing the pledge, Allston had revealed to no one the apparently supernatural agency by which he was saved, and adhered to the resolution that while it so appeared, it should be kept a secret in his own breast. The Bible was hidden carefully away from his sister's sight.

"Was it Emma Clifton who spent the night with you?" the young man inquired of his sister, while one morning at breakfast they chatted as of yore.

"Neither she nor any one; what gave you the idea?"

"Why, I heard your voice—it must have been very late—you was talking and laughing—and then your door opened and shut several times."

"You must have been deceived; I never slept better."

Allston recollected that his sister when quite young had a habit of walking in her sleep whenever her mind happened to be particularly impressed. He said no more, but when within a few nights after, he was awakened by Alice's leaving her room singing, he rose cautiously and looked into the hall. With a countenance radiantly happy, the girl paced backward and forward, chanting a hymn of praise which had been an especial favorite with their mother. Alice had a sweet, well-cultivated voice, and the soul of the listener thrilled to the endeared melody poured forth all unconsciously. Nothing ever had so perfectly recalled to his waking vision a departed mother's image; and this reflection instantly associated the somnambulist with the midnight pledge.

It was not long before his suspicion was corroborated; for re-entering her chamber, without closing the door, she placed her lamp upon a desk and sitting down began writing in a hand very unlike her own, and a perfect fac simile of their mother's. Standing just behind her, Allston looked on till the whole of the hymn he had heard sung was committed to paper; she then rose up, returned the sheet to the desk, shut her door, extinguished the light, and retired to bed.

The following evening just after tea, Alice, remarking to her brother that she would write a letter, went to her room. She shortly returned in much agitation, which she made an effort to conceal, taking a seat where her face could not be plainly observed. At length she spoke:

"Allston, do you not think our mother had a peculiar handwriting?"

"Rather so," he replied; "few now-a-days take the trouble to accomplish themselves so far in the art."

"Did you ever see any one who wrote at all like her?"

"I may have."

"I am sure that I never have; I have studied many a time to imitate, but never succeeded to the extent of a single line."

"Probably not; but what leads you to speak of it now? you seem excited."

"Well—it would not be strange if I am so.

Because—why, brother, on opening my desk to-night, I found the hymn she used to sing so often—

'When all thy mercies, O, my God,' written in her own hand and none other's, upon paper that I purchased scarce a week ago. You will presently believe me, Allston; for see! here it is—examine it."

"I have seen it before," said Allston, with a calm smile. "And I will show you something, likewise of recent date, which will exactly compare."

Bringing from his chamber the little Bible, he showed her the pledge, which to him was no longer a mystery. Alice was only the more astonished, till her brother explained all.

"You see the wonder is perfectly clear and rational now," he added; "and yet I shall always regard this pledge as somewhat a miracle; must not the spirit of our sainted mother have directed your act! Dearest Alice, you have saved your brother, and never henceforward, God helping, will he fail of being to you a brother indeed."

While they lingered over the subject with moist eyes, Dr. Clifton and his younger sister came in for an hour's sociality. Emma blushed when on being congratulated upon her rapidly improving health, which during the last year she had nearly lost, her brother glanced at Allston with a quickly significant smile. The latter, nothing disturbed to see his place by Alice's side familiarly usurped, led the fair sister of Henry to a window at the opposite end of the room, where he spoke to her in low, earnest tones, reading her pure face by the moon's silver light.

MRS. PARTINGTON.

"Some are more courageous than others, and some ain't," said Mrs. Partington, as the conversation turned upon heroic deeds. She was a widow of the corporal of the "last war," and her estimate of heroic deeds, as may be supposed, was based upon a thorough knowledge of what those deeds were. "Some will go to the Chimera to exercise feats of arms, and some will exercise their feats of legs by coming away. It needs more courage to face danger in the dark—to be waked up in the night by the howling salvages with their tommyhawks and scalpel knives, or to hear midnight buglars breaking into your house, or like the lady in Salem Street who waked up the other night and found a big nigger standing right horizontally by the side of her bed. It takes great courage to meet such things, depend upon it." The blood mantled to her cheek like the hue of a damask rosebush in bloom on the side of a yellow painted house, heroism sat behind her spectacle bows and peeped out of the glasses, while Ike was engaged in putting a clean paper dickey and a black cravat upon a "marble bust of Pallas," just forneinst our closet door—only this and nothing more.—Evening Gazette.

MY EARLY DAYS.

BY ROLAND S. EDWARDS.

Thoughts of childhood—thoughts of childhood—memories of our youthful days—

How they throng our recollection, through life's ever turning ways,

And we long in life's rough battle for the joyousness of youth—

For its freedom and its carelessness—its purity and truth.

When in life's calm, solemn twilight, our fancies backward roam,

When our race is almost ended, when we've almost reached our home,

When the sun of life is casting back his last, long-lingering ray,

And hope's evening star is promising the glorious, heavenly day.

Then, at nature's evening twilight—at that peaceful, holy hour,

When the past comes o'er our heart thoughts, and we're wrapped in memory's power,

As the deepening, pale-edged shadow drops softly in the west,

Velling o'er the molten splendor with its purple robe of rest;

While the bull-frog's mournful base notes fill our sadly listening ear,

Bringing back our childish reveries on the mossy flag-stone
dear;

And we sit for a few short moments, though long to memory's eye,

On that same old stony door-step, listening to the bull-frog's cry.

Listening to the tearful stillness which on all things seems to lie—

O, this blessed angel Memory—mid earth's struggles and earth's strife.

Breathing in upon our fancy sweetest visions of our life—
Pleasant footsteps only showing, in a path with sorrow rife.

LIFE'S TRIALS.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"Who is it, Matthew."

"Master Charles, ma'am. He wishes to see you immediately, if you will be so kind as to grant him an interview."

"Do I understand you to say that my nephew, Captain Meredith, is here?"

"Yes, ma'am, and he seems to be in great trouble about something."

The old servant spoke as if much affected, and looked at his mistress with a beseeching expression.

"Matthew, you know the resolution I have made in regard to Charles Meredith. Do you suppose he is in actual trouble, or only come to annoy me with one of those disgraceful affairs in which he has so frequently been entangled?"

"I believe Master Charles is in real distress, ma'am, and it would be better to break a hasty resolution than to let him suffer."

"Very well, Matthew, I will take your advice."

And the old lady rose from her solitary tea-table, and drawing her scarf closer round her shoulders, left the room, preceded by her stately attendant, who opened the doors, and after crossing several long passages ushered her into a handsomely furnished drawing-room, and bowing low, disappeared.

A gentleman was standing in the centre of the room, the image of anxious impatience; one moment he waiting for the closing of the door, the next he was kneeling at the feet of his relative.

"Aunt, dear Aunt Homewood, I scarcely dared to hope for this condescension from you. I have not deserved to expect favors from you, and yet have now come to ask another."

There was evidently a great struggle going on in the mind of the old lady, as she stood for a few moments earnestly gazing on the beautiful countenance of the speaker, which, flushed and anxious-looking, was raised to her own. Something in that eager look appeared to sweep away her angry feelings, for bending down, she lifted the tangled curls from his brow and kissed him with motherly affection.

"The past is forgiven, and henceforth forgotten, Charles; and now tell me what I can do to assist you at present, for it needs no words to tell me you are in trouble."

"I am indeed in trouble, and nothing but the extent of my distress and anxiety would have tempted me to annoy you again with my difficulties."

"Tell me at once what they are, and if possible I will assist you."

The lady was evidently alarmed at the tone of desperation used by the speaker.

"Aunt, I am married, I have been married for the last four months."

The lady gave a start of surprise, but controlling her feelings, said calmly:

"Is that the cause of your sorrow, my dear Charles? It ought not to be."

"I must tell you the whole story, aunt, or you will not be able to understand it. I married my wife against the wishes of her relations. True, she had no parents, but her father's will made her dependent on the caprice of her uncle, without whose consent she was not to marry, or if she disobeyed him, to forfeit the immense fortune he had bequeathed her. A marriage had been planned for her, or rather, she was in danger of being sold to a man twice her own age, but whose immense fortune made him indifferent about her money—a great consideration in the opinion of her uncle.

“Get your niece to consent to have me, and her fortune is yours,” said the wealthy Mr. Richmond.

“Emily can be married to-morrow to a man who is utterly indifferent about the property,” said the uncle, when I asked his consent to my suit. ‘Can you take her on those terms?’

“On any terms,” I replied, eagerly.

“Well, you cannot have her at all. I am not going to see my niece marry a beggar, because she has fallen in love with a scarlet coat. She will marry the man I have chosen for her.”

“That night Emily and I were married, and far from the home of her enraged friends, I have maintained her comfortably, nay, given her all the luxuries she has ever been accustomed to, and of our happiness I cannot speak. She has shown me the folly of my past life, has been a guardian angel to me; and now, when her society and love are necessary to my very existence, I am called on to part from her. Our regiment is ordered to India; take her I cannot, leave her here alone and unprotected I dare not, what I am to do I know not.”

“Hush, do not despair. I will think this difficulty over, and in the morning we will feel better able to decide what is to be done.”

“The morning! Dear aunt, I must be far hence to-night. But three short days and I must be on the ocean.”

“Then bring your wife to me. I will be a mother to her, and she shall never want a home while I live. There, no thanks. None know how well I loved your mother, how dear you yourself are to me. And now lose no time in making your arrangements, spend the last day with her here, and may God ever keep you, my dear, dear boy.”

One instant Charles Meredith was clasped to the heart of his kind friend, the next he had rushed from the apartment and the sound of his horse's steps came borne on the evening breeze. For many minutes the Lady of Homewood sat buried in deep thought; the changing expression on her countenance alone telling of inward struggles. But at last with a heavy sigh and stern resolve she drove the traces of feeling from that pale face, and summoned her faithful Matthew.

“Let the south rooms be immediately prepared for visitors,” was the order given to the old man, who looked astonished at seeing her alone. “And Matthew, see that everything is done for the comfort of our guest, my nephew's wife.”

“Master Charles married!”

The old man started with astonishment.

“Yes, married, and about to leave England; but you shall know all to-morrow, my faithful old friend; at present I am unable to converse. Send my maid, and give orders for the instant commencement of preparations.”

Forty years before the period at which our history commences, the young heir of Homewood had brought his fair bride with fond happiness to the home of his fathers. And well might Walter Homewood be proud of his conquest, for peerlessly beautiful and richly dowered came the Lady Elizabeth to her idolizing husband. Disappointed suitors envied the fortunate candidate who had succeeded in thawing the icy heart of the proud but lovely lady, and there were not wanting those who felt aggrieved to think that the young heir should have gone to a far distant country in search of a bride.

But outwardly all were smiling congratulations, and the marriage likely to prove a happy one. Alas for that outward, deceptive seeming. A very short period served to convince Walter Homewood that he had acted rashly; and Lady Elizabeth, with all her strong, proud resolution, yet shuddered at the responsibility she had assumed. To explain this we need only say, that led away by his fond passion, the young lover had wedded one, who had already bestowed her heart on another. Touched by his earnestness, and feeling that he was not influenced by any other than the purest of motives, Lady Elizabeth had unfolded the painful past, acknowledged her weakness in still loving one who could never be hers, and ended by entreating Walter to withdraw his suit, and leave her to mourn over her disappointed hopes.

But the knowledge of her blighted affections made no change in his love. He argued that she was still so young, that once his wife, he would dare all the world to keep him from winning her heart; he pleaded long and earnestly and at last succeeded.

“I will be your wife; in all that pertains to a wife's duties I will be true and faithful, but I have no love to give, and I am not capable of feigning.”

With joy unspeakable he kissed the white hand that rested in his own; he dared not embrace her. There was no trembling confusion, to embolden him to clasp her to his heart, to whisper words of loving fondness, or tender encouragement; but she was his, his own promised bride, and he felt confident that some day she must love him.

Alas, days and months passed on and no change was visible; always polite and attentive, always respectful and anxious to please him, not a fault could be found with the conduct of the young mistress of Homewood, and yet the warm-hearted Walter was miserable and unhappy, and his wife scarcely less so.

He felt keenly the little success his efforts had met with; duty, that cold word, alone dictated the conduct of his idolized wife. He would have given worlds to have seen one emotion of jealousy, of anger even, flush that sweet pale face, to have seen one look of love sparkle in those beautiful eyes, but the calm smile, the friendly hand clasp that was ever his welcome, maddened him, and at times he deeply repented having sacrificed both to his impatient love.

Two years after their marriage, however, a change took place for the better. Walter Homewood as he gazed on his beautiful young wife and her precious infant felt all his fond devotion renewed, and she, in this new found treasure, forgot the love that had hitherto been the one passion of her life.

Three years passed, bringing sorrow to him who once possessed Lady Elizabeth's heart. She shuddered as she heard of the successive deaths of his children, and the despair of himself and wife, and that wife was her own sister. Captain Meredith was now an object of pity. Living unhappily with her for whom he had sacrificed his first love, bereft of his beautiful children, and in delicate health, the spirits of the once gay-hearted young officer were crushed.

When young Homewood was entering his eighteenth year, it would have been difficult to have found one on whom the shadows of fewer sorrows had fallen. Possessed of all that could make his life delightful; the darling of his parents and a large circle of friends; with a happy disposition, and a mind to appreciate his blessings; who but would have foretold a bright future for this favored child of fortune? And yet it needed but a trifling commencement, a few hours' exposure to an autumn storm, followed by fever, prostration, rapid decline, and the doting parents are childless.

The shock would probably have been fatal to Lady Elizabeth but for the new trouble that soon menaced her. The husband to whom she felt she had never been a loving wife, sank beneath the dreadful blow; and in her anxiety to atone for the past neglect, the sorrowing mother banished her own selfish feelings and devoted herself unremittingly to the care of her husband. And Walter Homewood, with the knowledge that his wife at last returned his love, would fain have clung to life, but it might not be, and once more Lady Elizabeth was alone in the world.

Three months after the death of her husband, she stood at the bedside of her dying sister and received from her hands the sacred charge of her fatherless infant, the last of a large family. The child was taken to Homewood on the death of the mother, and as her own did the widow bring up the little Charles Meredith.

Beautiful, self-willed and high-spirited, as he grew up he became the darling of his aunt and the pet of the household; but, unlike the lost Walter, his own selfish ends were always to be attained at whatever cost; and with all her love, his fond relative found enough in the conduct of the headstrong boy to try her utmost patience. Against her wishes he entered the army at a very early age; to her great displeasure he had refused to form an alliance every way suitable; and we have already seen that his marriage was secret, and far from showing that respect to his adopted mother, that was her due.

But with the knowledge that she was about to part with him, perhaps forever, was banished all remembrance of his ill deeds, and nothing remained but the recollection of how she had loved him in his childhood, and how dear his parents had both been to her. To show every kindness to his young wife, was now the engrossing thought, and when Charles, with almost womanly sorrow placed the poor heart broken girl in her arms, she vowed to be a mother to her, and faithfully performed her pledge.

It was heart-breaking to witness the sorrow of poor Emily Meredith after the dreadful parting with her husband. Not a murmuring word escaped her lips, not even a tone betrayed impatience; but the deep sorrow in her blue eyes, the gradual fading of the rose on her cheek, and the wasting of her once rounded arms, betrayed the ravages of grief. She no longer looked the young, childish creature of a few months previous; care had made her old, given thought to her countenance, and womanly dignity to her step.

"My child, is there aught I can do to render you less unhappy?" asked the old lady, one evening when Emily appeared more than usually oppressed with sorrow.

"Nothing, dear aunt; I am surrounded by everything my heart could wish for, and but for one thing would be the happiest girl on earth."

"But, my child, you must conquer this injurious grief. Charles will come home one of these days, we will persuade him to give up his commission, and you shall both live here with me as long as I live, and at my death, Homewood is to belong to Charles."

"Dear aunt, your kind intentions will never be carried out. I feel that I shall no more meet Charles in this world. I felt it when he first told me we must part, and each day but confirms the impression."

Vain were her kind relative's efforts to banish these gloomy forebodings from the mind of the young wife. It was a settled conviction that she should soon die, and arguments were useless to combat it. Her health grew gradually more and more frail, but never was invalid more patient and gentle. She smiled sweet thanks on old Matthew, who, idolizing the girl-wife of his young master, was unfailing in his attentions. While she was able to walk out, he attended her, and when this pleasure was denied her, he adorned the rooms with the sweet flowers she so loved.

For hours Emily would sit and listen to her aunt's stories of by-gone happy days of the kind husband and fondly loved son. With deep interest she gazed on the handsome likeness of the one, and the sweet, boyish resemblance of the other, or with trembling fingers touched the cherished relics of those long lost ones' books and letters, toys and playthings, and dearer than all, those two carefully preserved curls, the one black and glossy, the other soft, fair and silken. The days passed calmly at Homewood, and all interest in worldly matters appeared to have forsaken the young wife.

Not even when the good old lady brought forth from their hiding-places (where they had reposed so many long years) rich and beautiful muslins, costly embroideries, the most exquisite productions of the loom and fingers, and with tearful eyes besought her to accept them, not even then was an emotion visible on the fair but faded countenance of the broken-hearted girl.

But why prolong a painful story? Six months after her arrival at Homewood, Emily Meredith breathed her last, and the piteous wailings of an infant resounded through walls long unused to such sounds.

"To you I bequeath her," the young mother said, a few moments before her death. "Keep her, dear aunt, until her father comes to claim her; in you she will find a better mother than I could have been to her."

And the old lady, with distressing emotion, clasped to her heart the infant grandchild of him who had been her first love, and promised to devote the remainder of her life to the helpless little being. They laid the mother in the grave, and with bitter sorrow wrote the sad history to the absent husband and father.

"Meredith, for Heaven's sake, strive to conquer this grief, or it will kill you. It is now nearly a week since that fatal letter came and in that time you have never rested or taken food. A reasonable sorrow I could respect, but this is sinful despair. Think of your child, the precious legacy of your lost wife, for the sake of it, do not throw away your life."

So spoke Colonel Carter, a faithful friend and adviser, but his words were lost on the listener.

"My Emily, my wife!" was the despairing cry that night and day fell from the lips of the stricken man.

"Will you go home? Shall I use my influence to get you leave of absence, Meredith?"

The kind-hearted colonel was deeply touched at the utter and hopeless despair of the once brave and gallant young officer.

"Home! no, there is no home for me. Think you that I wish to drive myself to distraction by again visiting the scenes of my more than earthly bliss? No, never will I return to the land that is one vast grave to me, the tomb of all my hopes and joys."

"But your child?"

The colonel's voice trembled, he himself had buried an only and darling child.

"I shall never behold her; it would be misery more than I could endure."

And Charles Meredith kept his word, and years passed on, and time and sorrow strowed gray hairs thickly on his head, and still he was a wanderer in foreign lands, and his young daughter was growing up to womanhood almost in ignorance of his existence.

A great change had taken place in the once energetic and strong-minded lady of Homewood. The once erect and stately figure was bowed and bent, the clear judgment had become weakened and clouded, and in addition, blindness was threatening the frail and fast failing old lady.

The infant bequeathed to her care had now become the protector, the comforter, the blessing of her old age. Sight to the darkened eyes, and strength to the frail limbs, was the beautiful Elizabeth Meredith, and well did she repay the care bestowed on her infant years, by unremitting attention to the friend of her childhood.

Old Matthew, like his mistress, was fast hastening to the grave, and many an anxious thought it cost the faithful servant, to know what would become of his beloved young lady when left unprotected and alone, as was evident must be the case in a few years.

At the time we introduce her to the reader, Elizabeth Meredith was in her sixteenth year, an exceedingly lovely girl partaking of the beauty of both parents. But the chief charm was her sweet disposition, her untrifling patience and devotion to her aged benefactress, and her total forgetfulness of self. Young as she was, the heiress of Homewood was already the object of attention to more than one interested suitor, and in this was the foundation of old Matthew's anxiety.

"It is not for yourself they would win you, Miss Elizabeth," would the old man say, when alarmed at the visits of the sons of their neighbors. "They don't know how to value you, my dear young lady; it is the hope of gaining your fortune that brings them here, and you must always bear that in mind when they come love-making."

"Don't be alarmed for me, Matthew; I shall never marry, but live here all my life at dear old Homewood, and spend my time doing good, and making others happy, as aunt has always done."

And the old man would murmur a blessing on her, and go away feeling satisfied that for the present, at least, his dear young mistress was heart free.

But circumstances over which he had no control, at last brought the danger he had dreaded to their very doors, and even old Matthew was powerless to change the current of events. A stranger, young and handsome, was thrown from his carriage at the very gates of Homewood, and as he was dangerously injured and the village offered no accommodation for one of his rank and station, common humanity demanded that he should be taken to the mansion.

It was several weeks before Sir Henry C—— (for that was the stranger's name) was allowed to leave his room; but when reason resumed her sway, and the delirium of fever departed, there came a faint remembrance of an angel face bending over his couch, the recollection of a cool hand on his brow, and the fitting of a figure through his room, very different in appearance to the attendants that now surrounded him, the venerable Matthew, an aged nurse and a grave-looking but skilful physician. Day after day he silently pondered on this strange apparition, unwilling to ask an explanation, and at times almost convinced that the visitant was merely conjured up by his disordered imagination.

However, his doubts on this point were one day set at rest forever on beholding the same face and form in the garden below his window, and now he was convinced that it was an inhabitant of earth.

Elizabeth Meredith was attending her aunt in her morning walk, and all unconscious that her words were listened to, she strove to impart some of her own cheerfulness to her desponding relation, speaking hopefully of all the old lady's troubles, and tenderly supporting her feeble steps. That hour decided the fate of the young baronet.

Alone in the world, as far as near relations were concerned, Sir Henry C—— has hitherto given but little thought to the aristocratic beauties that adorned the circle he frequented in the metropolis, and women had been among the least of his pleasures or cares.

Now, however, the case was altered. He daily made his appearance in the parlor, supported by the friendly arm of old Matthew and his own servant (who had been summoned to attend him), and there, in the quiet and repose necessary to his still-precarious condition, he learned to love as he had never dreamed of loving.

For hours he would listen while Elizabeth read to her aunt, or played and sang the songs loved best by the old lady, or in pleasant conversation beguile his aged hostess into remembrances of the past until her present troubles were forgotten. She soon became strongly attached to the agreeable young stranger, and evinced great dislike to his departure; and even Matthew, careful, suspicious Matthew, was so won over by the young man's patient submission to suffering, and thankful appreciation of kindness, that without a fear he allowed him to sit beside his young mistress, to receive numberless little attentions from her kind hands, and when at last the time came for his departure, it was through Matthew's contrivance that he obtained an interview alone with the beautiful girl.

But poor Matthew's plans suffered defeat, and he would not have rejoiced in his young lady's prospects, could he have heard the parting conversation between the lovers. We will not repeat it all; the conclusion will explain the state of affairs sufficiently.

"And so I am to go away without one hope, Miss Meredith? You will not even allow me to look forward to a future meeting."

The young man spoke sadly, and his companion was evidently touched by his sorrow.

"I will not say never; but while my aunt lives, my love and duty are hers. I am very young yet, and my father may return, my dear father, whom I have never seen. I will never promise to marry until I am obliged to give up the hope of his return."

"But, dear lady, your father could not find ought to object to in the offer I now made you, provided your own heart consents. I fear there is the real objection. Your aunt already is partial to me; could I not persuade you to let me share the sacred charge you have undertaken? Or is it as I sometimes fear, that another will divide that labor of love with you?"

"None, none other can ever share it with me."

"Then let mine be the holy task, dear one," was the whispered reply, as trembling and ashamed the gentle girl was drawn close to her lover's heart.

There was silence for one instant, both feeling too deeply for words, and then Elizabeth Meredith disengaged herself from the clasping arm, and with a pale but decided countenance stood before her lover.

"You know my secret now, Henry, the secret that within the last few weeks has changed me from a thoughtless girl, into a sad-hearted woman, but think not that you can change my resolution. I have vowed to devote myself to her who protected my infant years. None can share the duty, you least of all," and the girl's voice trembled, but recovering herself she continued. "While Aunt Homewood lives, my love and care are hers, and at her death I shall leave my home and never return until I find my father, provided he does not return in the meantime."

Two years had passed since Elizabeth Meredith parted from her lover, two long years, and not one word had she heard of or from him in that time. Many and severe trials had she encountered in that time, and now she was called to see her beloved relative die, and none were near to cheer the heart of the lonely and saddened girl.

Friends and strangers were there, but their words were the common forms of consolation, and the girl wept bitterly at her lonely condition, without one relative to share her grief, one loving heart on which to repose her sorrow.

It was the day of the funeral, the day on which the aged mistress of Homewood was to take her place beside the silent tenants of the family vault.

In a darkened room, her face buried in her hands, weeping bitterly, and striving in vain to shut out the sound of the tolling bell, sat Elizabeth Meredith, feeling desolate and forsaken, not daring to think of the future, looking with hopeless regret on the past.

Many strange footsteps are passing through the old mansion, and with hushed movements the servants are removing the tokens of recent death. The young girl pays little heed to those who intrude on her grief, nor does she raise her head to see two strangers who cross the apartment and stand before her with looks of love and sorrow blended in their countenances.

"Elizabeth!"

Wildly she dashes the tears from her face, and springing to her feet stands for a moment motionless with astonishment, then with a cry of joy she sinks into the arms extended to receive her, and once more is clasped to her lover's heart.

"My Elizabeth, my precious child, look up. Have you no love to bestow on your father, or does this stranger claim it all?"

"My father!" How passionately the word is pronounced. "Now indeed are all my griefs ended. My father come at last, my Henry true. O, how wicked was I to despair of ever being happy again."

Captain Meredith had returned to his native land through the persuasions of the lover of his daughter, and bitterly did he now repent having for so many long years deprived himself of her affection and society. He spent the remainder of his life with her and her husband, and in witnessing their happiness, he forgot to moan over his own early griefs.

A ROYAL LADY.

Our readers will be interested in the following description of the English Princess Royal, Victoria's eldest daughter, from the pen of a correspondent of an Aberdeen Journal: "With the remembrance, as if it had been yesterday, of the boom of the guns which announced her birth, I was scarcely prepared to find her a fine grown woman, taller by a couple of inches than her mother, and carrying herself with the ease and grace of womanhood. It is no stretch of loyalty or courtesy to call the Princess Royal pretty—she is perfectly lovely. The regularity of her features is perfect. Her eyes are large and full of intelligence, imparting to her face that sort of merry aspect which indicates good humor. The nose and mouth are delicately and exquisitely formed, the latter giving effect of great sweetness. The princess is more like her father than her mother. She is like the queen in nothing but the nose. In all other respects she is a female image of her father. I should add, as interesting to your lady readers, that she wears her hair slightly off her forehead; not pushed back in the Eugenie fashion, but brushed latitudinally from the temples, and raised at the sides above the ear in bandeaus (really, the ladies must excuse me if I am talking nonsense, for I have not given that hostage to fortune which would enable me to speak ex cathedra). Well, at any rate, the princess is fair enough and lovely enough to be the heroine of a fairy tale, and the Prince Frederic should consider himself a lucky fellow. —Portfolio.

When I pronounce that sensibility is the characteristic of goodness of heart with mediocrity of talent, I make an effort of which few men are capable. For if ever nature created a heart of sensibility, you know well that it is mine.

THE SISTERS.

BY ANNETTE HAZLETON.

"MOTHER, why did you not let me accept Mrs. Swift's invitation to attend Eleanor's party to-day?" said Lillie Tremont, a girl of twelve, to her mother.

"Because, my dear, I never allow my children to associate with low people, like the Swifts."

"Why, ma, I think Eleanor is a very sweet girl; and everybody says they are nice people."

"Of course; but then you know they're poor, and you, my daughter, are old enough to know that if you commence going in such company, you can keep no other."

Lillie made no reply, but playing with the end of her belt-ribbon, gazed steadily on the carpet. At this moment two ladies entered the room—they had come to make a fashionable call upon the mother. One of them, the widow of a late banker, was of course attired in the usual mourning garb, for her husband had been dead scarce four months; while the other—who, by the way, was the widow's sister, Mrs. Norton, and who had been married but a few weeks, showed by the richness and gaiety of her dress that she belonged to the ton of Philadelphia.

The usual ceremony of meeting being over, the ladies seated themselves, and the three commenced a conversation after the usual manner of gossiping visitors, finally winding off by expressing it as their candid opinion that a respectable merchant, Amos Dean, was about to fail.

"O, what a pity it would be!" said the rich widow. "Why, only just think of Laura, she's always been taken so much notice of in society." They all three sighed deeply, and the widow continued: "But still it's no more than I expected—pride must have its fall, you know."

"Certainly," replied the sister; "but I hope they won't be as impudent as the Swifts are. Why really, Mrs. Tremont, don't you think Mrs. Swift sent an invitation over to sister's for Julia to attend her little girl's party?"

"Did she go?" exclaimed Lillie.

"Of course not, my dear," rather angrily replied her mother.

"Why, here's our dear little Lillie," exclaimed Mrs. Norton; and she drew the child to her side. "How charming she looks in this embroidered muslin—she'll make a lily indeed in society when she becomes a little older."

The child blushed, and immediately left the room.

"She'll make a perfect fairy in the ball room; but pray, my dear Mrs. Tremont, I thought you were going to send her to Mrs. Allen's boarding-school," said the widow.

"She will go within a fortnight," replied Mrs. Tremont; "that is, if her father does not oppose me too strongly."

"What! does your husband oppose you in educating your children?" exclaimed Mrs. Norton, with an air of great surprise.

"Why you know, my dear, men always have a great deal to say about fashionable boarding-schools."

The two visitors laughed right out at this, and the widow remarked "that her husband used to leave the managing of such business to herself, and that had he interfered it would have made no difference."

Mrs. Tremont sighed deeply as she replied:

"Ah! Frank is so set you cannot turn him an inch."

"But he can't find much fault, for he knows you brought a large sum of money from your father—enough, indeed, to educate your children to your own liking," said Mrs. Norton.

"I've given him to understand that," replied Mrs. T.; "but really, you don't know what a trial he is to me. He has already sent Agnes into the country to stay a year with his sister, and threatens to send Lillie unless I give up the idea of training her my own way."

At length these most sympathizing friends took their leave, and Mrs. Tremont was again left alone to ponder over the best method of overcoming her husband's objections concerning Lillie's education. As for Agnes, she never cared for her, but she loved Lillie as well as a worldly mother can love.

Now Mr. Tremont was by no means a domestic tyrant. He was a man of a kind heart, and was, fortunately, possessed of good common-sense. He married his wife when they were both very young—more at the suggestion of his parents than of his own affections. He did not understand human nature then so well as he does at present—now he sees the error of false training, and is anxious to give his children an education, such an one as may fit their immortal minds for something better than breaking hearts, buying ribbons, and dying at last with no other mourners than the mantua-maker and milliner. He has long seen that his youngest child, Agnes—now but nine years old, had no share of her mother's love, and for this reason he had sent her to the country to stay with his sister, Mrs. Baily; he knew she would be well cared for there, both as respects physical and moral culture, while she would not be missed at home.

But Lillie was still a bone of contention between them. Her mother, however, had made up her mind that she should be sent to the boarding-school; so it was useless to say more, as Mr. Tremont especially disliked being reminded of the hundred thousand dollars his wife had brought him at their marriage.

It is unnecessary to our present purpose to record the events which followed in the next five years; only we will inform our readers that Miss Lillie was sent off to Miss Allen's school the next week, there to be instructed in the refined arts—the hollow heartlessness of fashionable life.

It was one of those lovely days which Indian summer alone can bring; a holy calmness—a Sabbath-like stillness—rested on the face of nature. It was about the middle of the afternoon that a gentleman and lady might have been seen sauntering down a lane, situated not far from — Boarding School. It was indeed a beautiful place, and well-selected for a walk. The two wandered on, occasionally stopping to gather "some things of beauty" which lay strewn in their pathway, until they came to an arbor, formed by the grape vines twining themselves into the limbs of two tall maples, and again falling gracefully to the ground.

"Here is a seat for us," said the gentleman; and the two seated themselves. Her waist was encircled by his arm, and her head reclined gently upon his breast.

"O Edgar, how lonely this place will look when you are gone. I shall never want to see it again."

"But, Lillie, a year will soon pass by, and then I shall return to make you happy, and my own heart blessed."

"A year!—it seems like an age," replied the fair girl.

The young man imprinted a kiss upon her fair brow, and continued:

"You are now seventeen; in six months more you will leave school."

"Yes; but why should we speak of that now?"

"Lillie, ere twelve months have passed by, you will be introduced into the gaieties of society, and—"

"And what?"

"You may forget me then."

"Forget you? O, Edgar, how can you be so cruel!"

"I would not accuse thee, darling; but still, we do not always know our own hearts."

"Edgar, if you think I am false-hearted, tell me so at once, and do not trifle with me."

"Lillie, I mean not so; but bear with me one moment. I have seen much of the world, and have studied nature since my childhood, and I have never seen the man yet who knew his own heart."

"Ah! but Edgar, you know woman's heart is always true." And she laughed merrily.

He smiled as he replied: "I doubt not, Lillie, that you love me as I love you. I take your word and consider you mine; nor need that promise debar you from society. Go. Mingle with the gayest, and as you are true to nature, you will be faithful to me."

They now talked of the past, the present, and the future, until the swift wing of time brought the hour of parting. They were to meet no more, until twelve long months had passed away. The young man was to trust his life upon the angry wave, while the maiden was to place her spirit's fate upon the sea of fashionable society. Which was in the most danger time will show. Thus parted Edgar Dorance and Lillie Tremont, one year before the scene which we shall next describe.

Miss Tremont is just eighteen. This is her birthday night, and the elegant rooms of her father's mansion are brilliantly lighted up; for of course her birthday party must be a splendid one; to-night she is to "come out" into the fashionable society of Philadelphia. "Gay, handsome, accomplished, rich, she will make a sensation among the élite of our city to-night," Mrs. Tremont exclaimed to her husband, as the dashing belle passed into the next room. Mr. Tremont shook his head, but made no reply.

"O, Frank, it's always just so—you never took any notice of Lillie yet, at least as you ought to, though most fathers would be proud of her." He still made no answer, but rising, took his hat and left the house.

"Just like you," muttered the wife, as her husband closed the door after him, and she rose to re-arrange her toilet and prepare for the reception.

Hours flew by, and music and mirth reigned through the stately hall. The brilliancy and beauty of the new belle brought many admirers to her feet; but as she had been taught that her chief glory consisted in the number of conquests she made, of course she acted accordingly; and when the hour for breaking up had arrived, not one of her many admirers could exactly say he hoped. No—she understood her business too well for that.

A few mornings afterwards, a new member entered the Tremont family. This was none other than the daughter of Henry Craig, the only brother of Mrs. Tremont. Mr. Craig had failed, with many others of his time; in addition to this misfortune, his wife had recently died, leaving him with two children—Harry and Minnie. He was a very enterprising man, and one who would not easily give up to circumstances. He had therefore concluded to go, in company with his son, who was now nineteen years of age, to some distant place, there to accumulate a competency, at least, for his family. But a new difficulty now arose—what should be done with Minnie? She was now but fifteen, and was one of those sensitive, loving creatures, most unfit to go forth to fight the battle of life among strangers. He had finally concluded to place her under the care of his sister, Mrs. Tremont; and this morning, kissing her fair brow, he bade her good-by.

Minnie's heart was just ready to break, as her father and mother turned to leave her; but she succeeded in keeping back the tears which fain would have asked the sympathy of the world. She immediately retired to a room, where she might dwell upon her sorrows alone. The hour of dinner had well nigh arrived ere she could summon strength enough to descend to the presence of the family. It is true she had heretofore been treated kindly by her aunt and cousin, yet she felt an instinctive dread in seeing them now. But at length she brushed back her ringlets and descended to the parlor. Dinner was ready, and she was about to follow her aunt from the room, when that lady turned and said:

"Miss Craig, you may place my daughter's room in order while we are at dinner."

She left the room; and Minnie was petrified with astonishment. "What have I done that Aunt Maria should treat me thus?" And the poor child bowed her head upon her hands.

At last, dinner being over, the ladies returned to the parlor; they were much surprised to find "Miss Craig" had failed to do her duty. And Minnie received a sharp reprimand from her aunt. The timid girl could not say a word in defence of herself, so Mrs. Tremont rang the bell, and a domestic immediately entered.

"Here, Betsy," said she, "take this girl to the kitchen; teach her her duty there, as she seems unwilling to perform lighter tasks."

She followed the girl into the kitchen, where she was hereafter to be confined. She was to be instructed in many things, and especially was she charged never to call Mrs. Tremont "aunt," for now that she would be obliged to labor for a living, of course it would not do to claim so noble and high a family for relations. It is unnecessary, as well as perfectly impossible, to describe the feelings of this poor motherless one when she realized her situation. Her heart was broken—no wonder. She was seized with a brain fever, and long, long did she lay on that sick bed, to moan and sigh, enduring all her agony without one word of hope, one sympathizing friend to stand by her.

But we cannot endure to dwell longer upon this part of the picture. Let us draw a veil over it, and seat ourselves again in the large drawing-room; let us leave this miserable little attic for the elegantly-furnished parlor, and see what is going on there. Only another party; and see! there sits Lillie, the fairest of the fair, the brilliant belle of the company. The costly silks and jewels that adorn her person can scarce add a charm to her natural beauty of form and feature. She is seated at the piano; every eye rests upon her, and even her father seems pleased. An elegantly dressed gentleman is by her side, thumbing the piano and turning the leaves of her music-book with all the ease and grace for which his nation is famed. They call him the Count de Caima. The mother is now in her full glory; she sees her idolized Lillie—where?—surrounded by flattery (i. e. danger); she sees her worshipped by the gentlemen, envied by the ladies. What could better please her? This same French count is one of the greatest exquisites of the time, and reputed to be immensely rich! He is also said to have travelled much, and was about to return to his native land, when by chance he met with Miss Tremont. He is now detained simply by the love he bears the beautiful girl; surely, what could better gratify a mother's vanity—that is, such a mother as the one before us!

But there is another individual present whom we shall notice particularly, as he is somewhat concerned with our picture. It is Captain Durance. Tall and well-proportioned, possessed of all that ease of manners which constitute a gentleman, added to which is that noble dignity of carriage and expression which marks an American. Indeed, we think him far superior in every respect, if we judge by appearance, to the Frenchman. He has naught of that exquisite politeness, or, rather, agreeable deception, about him; but there is an air of candor, of open-heartedness, that cannot fail to attract friends. While he is conversing with Mr. Tremont, his eyes rest upon Lillie, and the reader may imagine that he, if not she, is thinking upon old times.

"My dear," said Mrs. Tremont, the morning after the party, "did you notice the gentleman who was conversing with your father last night?"

"Why, he was introduced to me of course. I believe he is one of pa's old friends."

"Yes; but your attention was so taken up with the count, you scarce noticed him."

"Are you acquainted with his family?"

"No; but your father is; and it must be very respectable. He came with his cousins—the Fletchers,—and you know they are idolised."

"I do not like the name much," said Lillie, and her voice slightly trembled.

"Why not, my dear? What is there about the name of Dorance that should displease you?"

"O nothing, particularly, only—"

"Only what?" And the mother gave an inquiring glance at her daughter.

"I once had a lover by that name!"

"A lover once! When? You've been in society but a few weeks, and—"

"O, it was sometime ago; when I was at school."

"Oho! I understand you now. Practising a little flirtation, I suppose; but pray, why should that make it unpleasant?"

Lillie hesitated a moment, and then proceeded to tell her mother all that had passed between herself and Edgar Dorance at the boarding-school. When she had got through, her mother smiled at her earnestness, and said:

"Surely now, Lillie, you don't feel conscience-stricken for such a slight affair! Why, you must think no more of breaking a heart than of placing a curl, if you would be a successful belle."

"Of course not, mama; but then I hope he'll never come here again."

"What if he does; you can make the count doubly secure by rejecting one old lover for his sake."

Lillie turned to her piano, and commenced playing a lively air; yet any one could see that all was not right within.

"Upon my life!" suddenly exclaimed Mrs. Tremont, "there comes Lois and—yes, it is Abigail. What could have sent them here just at this time?"

Lillie looked from the window and saw that a carriage had really drawn up to the door, and that two ladies were getting out.

It was not long before Aunt Lois and Cousin Abigail, as we shall hereafter call them, were ushered into the presence of the dignified ladies of Tremont mansion. Aunt Lois was the wife of Mr. Tremont's only brother, and resided in Fairfield county, Connecticut. The family was regarded with that kind of abhorrence by the city relations which fashionables feel toward country cousins, etc. Nevertheless, Aunt Lois would visit her dear brother and sister as often as once a year to inquire after their health.

Will the reader be surprised to hear that this lady was just one of the kind of women who took more pride in cultivating the merits of their children, and more pains in leading them gently into the paths of wisdom and virtue, than in all the vain-glorious bean-catching and heart-breaking in the world; and yet she was a woman of taste. If you should go to old Fairfield now, and search the county through, you'd hardly find a house more elegantly furnished, a yard more tastefully arranged, or a library filled with better books, than the one owned by George Tremont, Esq.; for an air of tasteful elegance rests on every thing which has been arranged by Aunt Lois. Yet this very lady was unfortunate enough to love fun.

She never failed to put on the appearance of a counterfeit Yankee matron when she visited her dear brother and sister at Philadelphia; and any one who might see her here as a stranger would have thought she had acquired her substantial healthy proportions by the means of "pumpkin pies and gingerbread." Abigail was like her mother in disposition, and like her, a perfect lady in appearance—unless she chose to be something else. She was now about twenty-one, and very good looking. On the present occasion, she was dressed moderately and plainly in a dark gingham, while her mother wore a plain black silk. This was, perhaps, going too far; but Aunt Lois's motto always was, "my true friends—those who love me—will not care for my clothes."

"I never brought Abby down to the city but once afore, and perhaps she'll want some training, so as to know how to conduct afore the city folks," said Aunt Lois, a short time after they had arrived.

This was answered by a cold nod and a whispered "yes" from Mrs. Tremont, and the country sister continued:

"Here's little Lillie, she can go round with her; you needn't be afeared to trust 'em out, for I'll warrant ye, Abby can take care of her, while she—"

Here Mrs. T. indignantly interrupted her by exclaiming, "My daughter will have plenty of attendants if she wishes to walk."

"I dare say she can; but then you'd no need to trouble her pa about it, as long as she's acquainted with the city, and Abby wants to see it; she'll take care on 'er."

Mrs. Tremont could endure no more; so ringing a bell, she ordered a servant to show the ladies to their room.

If Mrs. Tremont was just ready to burst with rage, the ladies were quite as near it with laughter; and it was only with the greatest exertion that Abigail could refrain from "giggling" as the parlor door closed after them. When they had reached their room, she exclaimed:

"O what a vain woman Aunt Maria is. I think she is even more so than Lillie."

"I want you to do your best, Abigail, to keep up appearances; for I'm determined to teach them a lesson. Your uncle Frank has suffered enough for their foolishness."

Abigail smiled; and had the reader seen the twinkle of delight in her blue eye, they would feel that Mrs. Tremont and Lillie had not seen an end to their trouble yet.

"Hark! what is that?" said Aunt Lois, and she placed her ear to the keyhole of a door leading from her room.

"Surely, it is some one in distress," replied Abigail.

Aunt Lois tried the door, and found it unfastened. She opened it without hesitation, and both the ladies entered the room. There they found a bed—if bed it might be called—on which lay a poor young girl, tortured with pain and wild with delirium. They approached the spot, and Aunt Lois pressed her hand upon the brow of the invalid. The girl immediately opened her eyes and exclaimed:

"O mother, mother! I knew you would come! where is father?"

Tears came to the eyes of Abigail, but her mother motioned her to stand back. She then endeavored to quiet the poor sick one by kind words and by various kind acts, which a true-hearted woman knows how to use for the benefit of the sufferer. At length the poor girl fell asleep, when Aunt Lois, leaving Abigail to watch by the bedside, really found her way into the kitchen, where she procured some cold water and various other articles for the use of her patient. She said nothing to the domestics concerning what she had seen; but determined to inquire of her brother on the first opportunity. This she accordingly did, and was of course surprised to learn that it was Minnie Craig, Mrs. Tremont's niece. She thought she had seen her before, as she really had, but now the poor child was so emaciated, she scarcely resembled the fair little Minnie of a year ago.

Every day, after this, Aunt Lois and Abigail would sit by the sick bed; and when the ladies in the parlor found it out, they merely said:

"Well, I'm glad of it. Perhaps it will keep them out of sight of our visitors."

"I declare, Miss Tremont, you look more bewitching than ever in that splendid head-dress."

This was the salutation of Captain Durance, as he entered the parlor where sat Lillie and her mother. The ladies had learned by way of Mr. Tremont that this same Captain Durance belonged to one of the wealthiest and most influential families of South Carolina; and it is to be wondered at that a few days should serve to make him one of their most intimate friends? The mother had even hinted to her daughter that it would be well to set him down on the list of lovers who might worship at her shrine.

"Why really, captain, you flatter me," replied Lillie.

"Not at all, Miss Tremont; but will you allow me the pleasure of seeing your cousin from Connecticut? I would like an introduction?"

"My cousin?" And Lillie turned pale.

"What cousin?" stammered out the mother.

"Why, your friends from Connecticut."

"Really, sir, I don't understand you," was again replied.

"Excuse me, ladies, if I am mistaken; but I understood Mr. Tremont that his brother's wife and daughter were here."

Mrs. Tremont was about to reply, when in came Miss Abigail, who exclaimed:

"Pray, Aunt Maria, who is inquiring for mother and me?"

What was to be done now? Nothing short of an introduction would do, and Abigail seated herself by her aunt's side as composedly as if she had been at home; she talked freely with the captain, and was even vulgarly familiar. Her aunt and cousin sat biting their lips, and the latter, scarcely saying a word, went and seated herself at the other end of the room. Upon seeing this, Abigail immediately exclaimed:

"Why, cousin Lillie, I didn't know that you were so bashful!" Then rising, she went up to the captain and whispered loud enough to be heard all over the room, "Yoa mustn't think nothin' of it, captin'; she's young, you know—only eighteen." And then, without the least ceremony, she left the room, and running to the bottom of the stairs, called out loud enough to be heard into the parlor, "Mother, mother, come down here quick; there's a gentleman here as wants to see you." Then running back, she seated herself by her cousin's side. In a few moments Aunt Lois made her appearance. No sooner had she entered the room than Abigail jumped up, exclaiming:

"Mother, this is Captain Durance, one of the smartest men I ever see; and I guess he's come to see Cousin Lillie."

Aunt Lois grasped him by the hand with "happy to make your acquaintance, Mr. Captain Durance, and if you git our little Lillie here you must come out and see the old place in Connecticut. I dare say she'd reckon of coming, only her pa's so busy he can't fetch her."

"Thank you, madam, I hope I may have the pleasure of doing so; but really, it may not be so easy a matter to captivate your nieces."

"O, as to cultivating her, she's got a purty good education now, I guess—as far as book-larnin's consarned,—and as to making pie and cakes, why my Abby here can larn her that in no time." And Aunt Lois stepped across the floor to Lillie's chair, saying, "Come, dear, dew play the capting a tane on the pianny; you do play so beautiful. Come, that's a duck!"

Lillie was about leaving the room, when her mother called to her. "Yes, my dear, give us a few tunes." Mrs. Tremont doubtless thought the music would be better than the voices of her relations; but the young lady thought it best to leave, so she paid no attention to her mother.

"Here, come back here, Lillie, child, you shouldn't disobey your mother so," exclaimed Aunt Lois; but Lillie went on to her room, where she locked herself up to cry over her mortifications.

"We've got an old pianny at home, one that George's sister left there, and Abby used to play some on that. Abby, go and try it."

The obedient daughter immediately seated herself at the instrument. The captain followed her, and was about to select a tane from the music book, when she suddenly cried, "Why, I declare, if you aint got a singin' book there; but I never play meetin' tunes." And she grabbed the sheets from his hand, throwing them across the room into her aunt's lap.

"Mother, what shall I play?"

"Can't you play 'Auld Lang Syne' the best?" replied the mother.

And Abby went to work. She thumbed away, getting the right notes about half the time, till she finally came to a full stop, exclaiming, "O dear, I'd rather do a week's washing any time!" And throwing herself back, fell against the centre-table with such force as to throw a Chinese flower vase on to the floor, breaking it into pieces.

"O, O, O!" she screamed.

The captain immediately helped her up, asking if she were hurt.

"O no; but it scared me so!" And looking disdainfully at the piano stool, she continued: "I forgot that high chair had lost its back."

Captain Durance now withdrew amid the "good-by's" of Aunt Lois and Abigail; and they really hoped he would happen there again before they went home. Mrs. Tremont said nothing.

"He's a real nice man I should think," remarked Aunt Lois, after he was out of hearing.

No reply.

"And does he really come to see Cousin Lillie?" inquired Abigail.

"No!" growled Mrs. Tremont. And Aunt Lois and Abigail withdrew.

"Really, Frank, I cannot stand it any longer!" said Mrs. Tremont, as she sat by her husband's side that night.

"What is wrong now, my dear?" coolly replied Mr. Tremont.

"I want you should send those miserable relations of yours home."

"Indeed, madam, I never turn my friends out of doors."

"You never did anything for the good of your family, yet," retorted the indignant wife; "but if you don't give them a hint, I shall."

"Act your pleasure," replied the husband.

Mrs. Tremont now went on to relate the mortifications of the day, and concluded by saying that Lillie had gone to her room and had done nothing but cry all the afternoon.

"Really," continued she, "I fear it will make her sick."

"I am sorry," said Mr. Tremont, "that one of my daughters is so foolish. As for Captain Durance, if he really loves Lillie, this would make no difference."

Mrs. Tremont now began to fear a moral lecture; so rising, she left her husband, and immediately ascended to her daughter's room.

About a week after this, it was announced, to the great joy of Mrs. and Miss Tremont, that Aunt Lois and Abigail were about to leave them for home. And greater yet was their pleasure, when the former offered to take Minnie home with her. And as the carriage rolled away at a rapid rate, bearing from the mansion the "horrible visitors," the ladies could scarce refrain from crying—so great was their joy.

Captain Durance and the French count were still constant visitors at the Tremont mansion. Balls and parties, flirtations and conquests, whirled away the time at a rapid rate, and spring at length arrived.

It is true, Captain Durance had never really asked the hand of Lillie in marriage—yet she felt that the time was drawing near when he would do so. It is also certain that Count De Caimé had proposed, and she had delayed giving him an answer, for she really liked the captain the best; and as he also was reputed to be rich, of course her choice lay between them. She hoped every day to have things brought to an issue, for she contemplated starting in a few weeks for the Springs, in company with her mother. Nor did she hope in vain. About three days before their intended departure, and while they were sitting alone in the parlor, a servant handed them a note. It was in a splendid hand, and directed to Lillie. She opened it; her eye rested on the name of Dorance. It was a plain offer of his heart and hand. She re-read the note, then handing it to her mother, she exclaimed:

"What think you of this?"

Mrs. Tremont glanced over the note; then throwing it on to the carpet, replied:

"Of course, my love, you will not answer it."

The young lady smiled scornfully, and picking the paper up, twisted it into bits. Reader, would you like to know what the contents were? There was something in the letter to this amount:

"DEAR LILLIE:—Though I love you, and though I give you my undivided heart, I cannot offer you wealth! My father, it is true, is rich, but his wealth consists principally in such a kind of property as I care not to possess. Therefore, dear girl, I may only say I can support you in good style, but cannot add to your fortune; yet I feel that your noble nature will love me the better for the principles which make me poor."

Ah, this was the end of hope with him! But never mind—the count is on hand, and plenty of time to captivate a score besides; for only just think—she isn't nineteen yet!

Two years passed away, and yet Lillie is not married. She still continues the same bewitching beauty as before, or perhaps her riper age has added even another charm. To-night she has gone to join an assemblage of wealth and beauty, and leaving her to enjoy herself as best she may, we will again seat ourselves in the family parlor of the Tremont mansion. Mr. and Mrs. Tremont are the only occupants of the room.

"What makes you always look so grave, Frank?" remarked Mrs. Tremont. "Why don't you laugh and talk like other people when you are at home?"

"I do not always feel happy as you do, wife," replied he.

"But why should you not?" asked she.

He made no reply to this, but drawing himself up to the table, took up a book and commenced reading.

"O, husband, do put by that old book and talk to me."

He did as she requested, and commenced talking about the return of their youngest child, Susan.

"Pshaw! she would never enjoy herself here; better remain where she is, for by this time, she will be better fit for the companion of your niece Abigail, than to act the sister to Lillie."

Tremont made no reply to this, but if we are to judge by his looks, we should say he was not well pleased with the remark. They were both silent for a few moments, but at length he turned to her and said:

"Perhaps, wife, you will be glad of her assistance shortly, notwithstanding her awkwardness."

"What do you mean?" asked she, somewhat startled.

"I mean that I expect a failure!"

"Impossible!"

"It is nevertheless true."

"Explain yourself."

"Simply, then, the parties you have given your daughter, with the expenses at Saratoga for two summers past, in addition to some trifling failures of my own, have broken me down."

How did the fashionable Mrs. Tremont receive this? Did she put her arms around the neck of her husband and say—"Well, Frank, if we're unfortunate in losing our property, we are happy in the possession of each other and our children. Don't be discouraged, dear husband—we'll have a home yet?" No, indeed. But I will draw a veil over the scene that followed.

The next day, she disclosed to her daughter all she had learned the night previous, and advised her by all means to secure the count before the failure became known. Parties were given to keep up appearances, all the splendors imaginable were displayed to the greatest advantage, and in less than four weeks the beautiful Lillie became the wife of Count De Caime, and embarked for Paris.

After the departure of her darling child, it was to be expected that Mrs. Tremont would feel the want of company. Her husband was none for her, or rather he was a continual pest—an eye-sore. Scarce a day passed without his hearing of the hundred thousand dollars, and if he ventured a reply, he was sure to receive such a torrent of abuse as would contribute to anything but happiness and love. It is not to be wondered at that he longed more and more, every day, for the presence of his favorite child Susan. Yet he expected if she did come, her mother would hate and abuse her for his sake. At length, however, the trial was made. A lovelier day never dawned than the one on which the fair girl was to return to the home of her infancy, after an absence of nine years. She felt the deepest regret at leaving her aunt, but her father called for her presence, and she must obey. She loved her father with all the depth and purity of her guileless heart, but her mother had been almost as a stranger to her. Indeed, Mrs. Tremont had never written a single letter to Susan, nor had she seen her during her long absence.

It was about sunset when she arrived at her father's residence. She did not stand for ceremony, but running into the parlor, threw her arms about her mother's neck with all the tenderness of a favorite child. To her great surprise, her mother returned the caress. This melted Susan's heart entirely, and falling at her mother's feet, she exclaimed :

"O, dear mother, I will always be your friend—I will always stand by you, nor forsake you!"

"What can you do, child?" replied the mother; but Susan heeded not the cold words.

The reader may imagine the different aspect which things assumed at the Tremont mansion, when the bankruptcy of its proprietor became generally known. Mrs. Tremont had labored hard to keep her situation from the sight of the public, but all things must be known sometime. And the proud lady—who had heretofore placed herself in fashionable society, with "fine raiment" for a foundation—where is she now? Alas! the foundation is taken from under her feet, and she beholds her halls neglected—deserted—by all except those she once despised. These, and these alone, now remain to comfort her. The merry, musical laugh of Susan, as she moves lightly from room to room, cannot but scatter some of the clouds. And even Captain Durance is an acceptable visitor. Although he met with a cold repulse from Lillie, his intimacy with Mr. Tremont had not ceased; and he even calls on the ladies, for he finds Susan an excellent company. And when he sits by her side, talking of foreign lands he has visited, or reading to her from some useful volume, we almost imagine that an affection is springing up—not such an one, indeed, as may be blasted by the word poverty—but we will see.

The mother, strange to say, breathes not a word against all this. She now discovers that Captain Durance is a man of good feelings, and if he isn't rich, why Susan is no better off! Perhaps she will never make a better match. Mr. Tremont is at home but very little, yet his wife does not know why he is absent. She never asks him if he has met with any new difficulty, or what it is that keeps him from home. That's nothing to her, of course; it's enough to know her own troubles.

Days, weeks and months pass by, and the idea of moving is suggested. This she would be glad to do, it is so mortifying to remain where people know her; but then to take a smaller, or a plainer house, is out of the question. It cannot be that Frank, after he has spent her money, should think of putting her into a hovel now! But at length she finds that go she must—for although Susan has filled the place of the servants, and though all unnecessary expense has been spared, the house has passed into new hands, and they must leave it. At last an idea is hit upon. George Tremont has offered his brother's wife and daughter a home, while Frank is trying to secure at least an humble one for their future wants.

Mrs. Tremont receives the invitation joyfully, and has already set the day when herself and daughter are to commence their journey to Connecticut Farms, to take up their residence with her husband's "miserable relations."

"My daughter," said Mrs. Tremont, a few days before they were to leave, "how comes on your business with the captain? I presume you are engaged."

Susan blushed, but made no reply until the question was repeated.

"Why, mother, he has proposed, and I have referred him to my father."

"Bravo, my girl! But how long before you are to be married?"

"Some time, I presume. You know I am young yet."

"Not so very—you are eighteen."

"I think twenty-one is quite young enough to marry," replied the daughter.

"Fie, you cannot expect to make conquests, and it would be foolishness to trifle with Durance."

"Indeed, mother, I do not intend to. I love him too well for that."

Mrs. Tremont gave one of those disdainful looks so natural to her, and continued :

"But surely, Susan, you don't intend to live single three years longer. Why, what will you do with yourself?"

"I have engaged myself for one year at least," replied Susan.

"Engaged yourself? how?" inquired the mother, somewhat surprised.

"As a teacher."

"A teacher?"

"Yes, for by this means I can support myself, besides laying up something with which to assist my father."

"My child, you are dreaming. Are you not going with me to Connecticut?"

"By no means, dear mother. My duty would not allow of it."

"Then I am to stay alone?"

"O, you'll not be alone, mother, for if Aunt Lois is as good as she appears, I'm sure you'll love her."

Mrs. Tremont gave another scornful look, as she replied :

"La! she may be good enough, but she will never be company for me."

"And then, mother," continued Susan, "you will have Lillie's letters to read—they will be a consolation."

The conversation was now interrupted, for the dinner hour had arrived, and father, mother, daughter and lover seated themselves around the board, while the cheerful looks and pleasant tones of the latter served to banish feelings otherwise unpleasant.

It was a fine morning in the month of September, when Mrs. Tremont bade farewell to her husband and daughter, and commenced her journey to Connecticut. She appeared unusually cheerful this morning, yet I would not have my reader suppose she was happy. No—she had spent too many years in cultivating those qualities of the benefit of which she is now deprived. She knows nothing—hears nothing—sees nothing in nature calculated to elevate her mind, or make her happy. Her thoughts were never placed on such "coarse things," and when she gets to the old farm, I doubt her knowing the difference between starlight and lamplight; and likely enough she'll think the moon, if she should happen to see it, is one of the lamps of her native city—strung up for her especial benefit—unless Aunt Lois should tell her the difference.

But we will leave her to herself for the present, and seek the side of Susan and her father. He is behind the counter of an old friend, acting as head clerk, while the daughter is surely enough teacher of a select school in the city. Health blooms on her cheeks, and intelligent kindness beams from her eyes. The very atmosphere around her is cheerfulness. It is true, her delicate frame sometimes finds itself almost unequal to the task imposed; yet the object of her labor, her father's good, strengthens her hand and prepares her for all difficulties. And when at night she hastens to join her father at their boarding-place, she is happy. Well might he be proud of her; but what would Lillie have done here?

But what has become of Captain Dorance? He has entered business with the same man who gives Mr. Tremont employment, and often will the father and daughter welcome him to their social fireside on the evenings of the coming winter. This is indeed a joy to Susan; a true affection is formed between the two—an affection which has grown from principle and feeling. The evenings are spent in reading, or in other ways of social improvement.

"Father," said Susan one night, when he had returned from the store, "I have got a letter from mother—will you read it?"

Tremont took the letter; he had not read far, however, when a smile lighted up his features, as he exclaimed :

"I thought she would sep the difference!"

It seems the letter was written some two or three weeks after Mrs. Tremont had reached her brother-in-law's. It stated her extreme surprise at finding everything in such good taste, and that Lois was really one of the most accomplished women she ever saw; and though she could not consider the country so pleasant as the city and its society, yet she enjoyed herself very well. Abigail had become the wife of a distinguished gentleman of New Haven; and her niece, Minnie, was really a very beautiful girl. She found considerable fault with her husband, however, for allowing his friends to deceive her so.

"I am glad your mother is so well satisfied," remarked Mr. Tremont to Susan, when he had finished the perusal.

"Yes," replied she; "but what does she mean by being deceived?"

Tremont then related the whole story of "the visit" to his daughter, as we have already done for the reader.

"And now," added he, "I have a secret to tell you."

Susan expressed her willingness to hear, and he proceeded.

"I have hopes of recovering our lost fortunes."

"How?" exclaimed Susan.

"If I can raise twenty thousand dollars, I can redeem the whole. A friend has offered his assistance, and I think I shall succeed."

"You are not certain, then?"

"Not exactly; and we had better keep what we know as a secret—for the present, at least."

Susan, of course, was much delighted with the new hopes which had sprung up, but she intended to keep her word in regard to secrecy—not even telling her friend Captain Dorance. With a lighter heart and a stronger hand, she proceeded to school on the next day—determined to be prepared for the future, let it bring what it would.

The winter has passed away, and spring has come again. It is Saturday evening, and Susan Tremont is alone in her room. The little table is spread for tea, and seems to be waiting. Susan is watching for some one. There she sits, just as she has done for an half hour, gazing anxiously from the little window which overlooks the street, as if some heavy load were weighing upon her heart. At length she rises, and hastily runs to the hall door.

"Heaven prepare me for the worst!" cried she, as she left the room.

She opened the front door, and her father entered. She looked at him inquiringly, but he said not a word. His face was very pale, and she feared all was over. She trembled lest their prospects were all perished—their last bright hopes dashed to the ground. Tremont immediately ascended to his room, followed by his daughter, who placed a seat for him by the window, that he might enjoy the cool breeze.

"My child, we are saved! all is right!" at length he exclaimed.

Susan answered not, but embracing him, burst into a flood of tears. Yes, all was right—their property retrieved—and Tremont mansion would again be their home, and her parents would be happy!

Three months have passed away. The Tremont family have again returned to their splendid mansion, and no one would think, as he passed by the door, that it had ever seen neglect. Now, all the dear family friends—that is, all the fashionable city acquaintances—are calling continually. Parties have been given, just as if nothing had ever happened, and now, dear reader, you may call Mrs. Tremont a happy woman.

"But where is your daughter?" asked one of the many city exquisites, who had made a point of calling frequently for a few weeks past, and who had taken much pains to ingratiate himself in the favor of the mother of Susan.

"I believe she's in the library with her father," replied Mrs. Tremont.

"How very retired she is," replied the fop. "Indeed, she is a perfect gem of modesty!"

While the two are thus conversing about our fair friend, we will take a look into the library and see what she is doing.

"My dear girl," said the father, as he laid his hand affectionately on her head, "Captain Durance has returned from the south, after an absence of six months; he has just learned of our success in regaining our own, but he fears he will be received no more as your suitor."

Susan blushed deeply.

"Father, I do not understand you."

"He thinks, my dear, that you will scorn his poverty now that you have wealth."

"O, father, how can you be so cruel—how can he, as to think me thus false-hearted?"

"But you must remember, my child, that the power is now yours to select from the many who can give you additional wealth."

"But the power is not in my heart, father, and what are all the splendors of sordid gold to me, in comparison with the love of one noble heart?"

"But hear me, child; it would sorely displease your mother, should you wed this man."

"My mother is a cold and selfish woman—forgive me for saying this, father, but I cannot help it."

"Susan, think of the deprivations you must meet with, if you become his wife—"

"Speak not of those, father—am I not able to meet them?"

Tremont clasped his daughter to his heart.

"You are indeed a true-hearted woman!" exclaimed he, at length. "You are one whom I am proud to own as a daughter. Here, Edgar, take my child—take the treasure from my own hand; she is yours!"

Susan looked up, and was not a little surprised to see Captain Durance before her. It was not until the first ecstasy at meeting was over, that she learned that he had stood concealed in the little recess ever since she entered the room, and had heard all the conversation between herself and father.

The chagrin of Mrs. Tremont was deep indeed, when she learned how affairs had turned with her daughter. She blamed her husband for encouraging either Durance or Susan, after he had found out that their pecuniary affairs brightened. And when Tremont tried to pacify her by reason, she would answer:

"Yes, indeed! I managed the love affair of Lillie's, and she is now a wealthy countess; while this graceless hussy has dared to have her own way, and you have encouraged her in it. But you'll see how it will come out! They'll both be beggars, for she shall never have a cent from here, if she does marry him!"

If he undertook to remonstrate to this, her reply universally was:

"A hundred thousand dollars isn't picked up every day, and I tell you, Frank, she shall never have a cent of that!"

But the wedding day was set, and all the efforts of the imperious woman could not delay it.

Weeks flew by, and soon the day arrived. Not into a splendid apartment, brilliantly lighted and adorned, to see a company selected from the ton of Philadelphia, assembled to witness the solemn and interesting ceremony, shall we be ushered! In one of the private parlors, are five or six individuals seated around the room. They seem to be particular friends—not fashionable, but true ones. There sit Uncle James and Aunt Maria, Uncle George and Aunt Lois, Mr.

Tremont and the venerable and revered minister. But Mrs. Tremont is not there. No—she could never see her house thus disgraced! Every sound is hushed, and a degree of solemnity rests upon the company. At length the door opens, and the couple enter. Surely Captain Dorance is a noble looking man, and Susan is as perfect a picture of innocence and sweetness as was ever seen!

"Well, I'm glad they're gone!" exclaimed Mrs. Tremont, the morning after the wedding. "Indeed, I never wish to see them again!"

"How can you talk so, Maria?" replied her husband. "Surely, you must have some feelings of the mother left."

"Not for her, the disgraceful thing!" and Mrs. Tremont angrily left the room.

Captain Dorance had started on that morning with his bride, for the south.

As Mr. Tremont walked towards his counting-room, he seemed to be deeply buried in thought. Was he thinking of the selfishness and vanities of his wife, or of the dear one from whom he had just parted? Perhaps he was contrasting the difference between his present wealth and recent poverty. If he was, he must have come to the conclusion that when he dwelt at the little inn, in company with his loving daughter, he enjoyed himself much better than now, when he must return, after a day of hard labor, to a cold mansion, and seat himself to a sumptuous table beside a wife whose soul was thoroughly encrusted by selfishness and vanity.

About a week after the departure of Susan, Mr. and Mrs. Tremont were entertaining a large company in one of their front parlors, when a servant entered, stating that Mrs. Tremont was wanted immediately in another room. That lady arose with great dignity, and after various polite ceremonies, left the room. It was not many minutes before another servant entered, stating that Mrs. Tremont was seriously indisposed, and could not see company again that evening. The visitors therefore departed, and Mr. Tremont hurried to the side of his wife. What a spectacle there met his eye! Mrs. Tremont had sunk upon a chair, and was just able to point towards the lounge, as her husband entered, and exclaim:

"For heaven's sake, look there!"

He looked in the direction to which she pointed, and beheld the form of a woman stretched upon the lounge—pale, emaciated and in rags.

"Tell me—O, tell me, is it so?" again cried his wife.

"It is Lillie!" exclaimed Tremont; and he stretched out his arms just in time to save his wife from falling to the floor.

He ordered the attendants to carry her to her room, and then approached the form upon the lounge.

"Lillie!" said he; "Countess De Caime, what means this?"

"O, speak not that hateful name!" groaned the woman, as she opened her sunken eyes upon her father.

"O tell me, my child, what has brought you to this?" said the father, as he stood by his daughter's side.

She succeeded, at length, in giving him an explanation, which was as follows: The count had started with her for Paris, immediately after the marriage, where he had remained till within a few months, when he had returned to New York. He there learned of her father's bankruptcy. Disappointed in his expectations of accumulating wealth by means of his wife, he had confessed to her his real name and character, and then deserted her to her fate. The count had turned out to be a regular impostor and fortune-hunter from New York! She was thrown upon a bed of sickness by this terrible disclosure.

"I had lain for seven long weary months upon a sick bed, enduring agonies I could not describe, without one friend to comfort me—deprived even of the privilege of writing to those who could protect me. I rejoiced when they took my babe from my arms, to lay it in the grave. But thank God," continued she, when she had summoned strength to speak again, "thank God, that he has permitted me to come home to die!"

Deep were the feelings of that father, as he bent over the form of his ruined and degraded child. She had sown the wind, and was now reaping the whirlwind. Who but the proud and weak mother had sown the wind?

The next morning, the clouds of sorrow hung heavily over the Tremont mansion, and the mother, as she gazed on the cold and haggard features of her daughter's corpse, wept bitterly when she realized the bitter dregs of the cup she had quaffed. But how terrible the experience! And when, forty-eight hours afterward, Dorance and Susan arrived, this mother could take her surviving daughter by the hand, and as she led her to the side of the dead Lillie, could say:

"Thank God, you have escaped such a fate!"

The art of conversation consists much less in your own abundance than in enabling others to find talk for themselves. Men do not wish to admire you: they want to please.

TO MY SISTER.

BY BLANCHE D'ANTOINE.

"O stay, before the fat's spoke,
And strike the lyre for me!"
Annie, the very accents choke
Whene'er I sing of thee.
My sister, I remember once,
A dancing little sprite;
Whose head o'ercurled with amber waves,
Whose eyes o'erbeamed with light;

Whose brow before the lily paled,
Cheeks, blushed before the rose;
Whose breath was perfume on the gale,
Whose teeth were pearly rows;
Whose witch-of-a-dancing joyous self
Ran waltzing everywhere;
And that same sprightly little elf
Was very like you, dear.

I'm gazing on thee, sister, now,
And peering in the future:
Methinks I view around thy brow
A wreath, the trio, richer.
Our brother 'll wave our country's flag
In gallant circles o'er us:
Poverty never 'll let me lag—
So I will join the chorus!

I see thee—Eve-like, gentle, mild—
A glorious type of woman!
But—after heaven—thou darling child,
Love something that is—human.
And let thy wreath of love entwine
A noble shrine and worthy;
When time shall pledge thee in old wine—
"Content o'ermasters glory!"

THE LIFE-BOAT.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

KATE WILLIAMS was an orphan. Her mother had been dead many years, while her father had left her more recently. He, the father, had been a sea-captain, and when he died he left his two children with all his wealth, amounting to nearly half a million of dollars. The other child was a son, named Frank, and older by some five years than was Kate, she being twenty, and he five-and-twenty. Frank was away. He had been travelling through Europe, but was expected home, when we introduce our story, in a very few weeks, if not days. The two children still retained the house and lands which their father had bought and occupied. It was a splendid mansion, within a very few rods of the shore, overlooking the broad Atlantic. It was a romantic spot, and the heirs had been offered great prices for it; but they had no desire to sell their old house. There were a few neighbors close by, and at the distance of about a mile was quite a village.

Kate Williams was a noble-hearted, generous girl, and everybody who knew her called her handsome. And so she was. She was none of your drawing-room ornaments, but a substantial individual, full of life and power, and realizing that she was one of a class who had work to do. She was a modest, pure being, but not one of your demure, downcast sort. She carried her virtue in her soul, and her purity in her thoughts; and her laugh was never so loud and joyous as when others could share in her happiness. Her eyes were gray, but a bright, handsome gray, full of light and intelligence; and her hair was light, almost too light for brown, and yet too dark for golden hair—though when the sun shone on it, the golden hues were rich and predominant. Her features were full and round, with dimples wherever a smile could rest, and glowing with the ruddy hue of health.

Is it a wonder that Kate Williams should be loved? Why, everybody loved her; but then there were two individuals who loved her very dearly—or, at least, who swore they did. The first was John Glancey. He was a young man, four-and-twenty, and a lawyer by profession, having been practising in the neighboring village for about two years. He was a good looking man; tall, straight and well-formed; with black hair and eyes, and possessing a proud, and at times overbearing spirit. He was not a liberal-minded man, but of this Kate knew not.

The second was Harry Winship. He was a year younger than Glancey, and by profession a physician, having been in practice in the village just two years. He was not so tall as his rival, and not so proud looking. His hair was light brown, and his eyes gray; and his looks owed more to the expression of his features than to their formation. He was not so much bowed to as was Glancey. A man, or a woman, would bow very politely to the lawyer; and then, in a moment afterwards, should they meet the physician, they would grasp his hand and smile. Glancey's clients respected him very much. Winship's patients loved him very much. This was the difference between the two men.

Now Kate Williams knew that both these men loved her, but as yet she had not chosen between them. They were both good men, she thought, and so far she had only allowed them the privileges of passing friends. She had not one particle of the coquette in her—not one thought of it. She meant to make her choice and adhere to it. While she was thus pondering, a circumstance transpired which influenced her, as we shall see in the sequel.

In the village lived a young female—a married woman—named Bolton. Her husband was away on business. One day Dr. Winship was called on to visit her. He examined her carefully and was not a little startled upon finding that she was actually suffering from delirium tremens. Her constitution was naturally frail, and the excessive use of rich wines had brought her down. He stated the case to the old nurse just as it was, and gave very rigid orders concerning the treatment she must receive.

In a few days after this the story of Mrs. Bolton's strange sickness got spread over the town, and when people were asked how they knew, they replied that Doctor Winship had said so. The truth was, the old nurse had done all the mischief. The story soon reached the ears of John Glancey. Mrs. Bolton was his own sister, a fact of which Winship had no knowledge. The young lawyer called upon the doctor at once. The latter would have received him cordially, but the former repelled all familiarity.

"Dr. Winship, did you say that my sister had been a drunkard?"

"Your sister, sir?"

"Ay, Sarah Bolton is my sister."

"Ah, I was not aware of that."

"Never mind. She was a female, and as such demanded your sympathies. Did you circulate the story, sir?"

"No, sir, I did not. I was called to see the woman, and I found her suffering under the influence of delirium tremens; and I explained the matter to the nurse so that she might know how to proceed. I have not opened my lips upon the subject to any other person, save, when I have been questioned upon the subject; and then I replied that as a physician I never answered such questions."

"Exactly," returned the lawyer, with some anger. "Such answers are enough to curse the character of any person, for they simply bid the questioner to surmise what he pleases. But, as you acknowledge, the story did originate with you, and is traced back through the nurse to your lips. Now I wish you to publicly dispute the thing."

"How, sir?" uttered Harry, with astonishment, "give the lie to my own professional decision? make myself responsible for the mischief of a tattling old nurse? No, sir."

"But remember, sir: The woman is my sister, and her station in society is such that this story will do her much harm."

"I am sorry, sir, very sorry; but I am not to blame. Three months ago I visited Mrs. Bolton, professionally, and at that time I warned her of this. You can do as you please with the story, but I can do nothing. Mrs. Bolton must suffer the same penalty for the violation of natural laws that others suffer. And she must suffer the same from the laws of our social fabric."

"Do I understand, sir, that you will not retract?"

"Retract? I have nothing to retract."

"I wish you to publicly announce, upon your own responsibility, that the story of Mrs. Bolton's having the delirium tremens is false."

"I cannot do it, sir," returned the young doctor, proudly. "Had I circulated the story I should have been much to blame; but I only gave the nurse such information as was absolutely necessary for her to do her duty. I trust you will see this in its true light."

"Doctor Winship, once more I ask you—will you retract this statement—"

"Hold. What statement do you mean?"

"That Mrs. Bolton had the delirium tremens."

"I never made such a statement. I simply stated to the nurse that Mrs. Bolton was suffering from the effects of over-indulgence in food and drink."

"Will you make the public statement I have demanded?"

"No, sir—I cannot."

"Very well," said the lawyer, as he turned away, "you shall hear from me again."

On the next day Harry Winship received a challenge from Glancey to mortal combat. The doctor sat down and wrote in reply that he could never be urged into the commission of a crime of such folly and wickedness as he considered duelling to be.

On the day following, the doctor received a second note in which Glancey informed him that he should be posted as a coward if he did not fight. To this Harry replied that he had too much courage to barter the integrity of his soul for the sake of a perverted and morbid public opinion. He was the coward who dared not refuse to do an evil deed.

After this the lawyer posted the doctor as a coward, and the latter soon found that he was shunned by many who had before sought his company. But the most cutting of all was a note which he received from Kate Williams. She informed him that he would please her by never presuming to approach her as a friend again. Nor did she leave him in the dark. She plainly told him that the friendship between them had been of that kind which must either ripen into the holiest affection of earth, or be nipped in the bud. She could not cast her lot with one at whom the finger of scorn could be pointed, so she would see him no more.

Harry was for awhile utterly miserable. He loved the fair girl deeply and truly, and to lose her thus struck a pang to his soul that created a torture the most intense. But on the next day he mastered calmness enough to write an answer to Kate's note. He first informed her of the love she had crushed, and then he touched upon the subject of the trouble between himself and John Glancey. First he explained the whole case, from first to last, of Mrs. Bolton's sickness, and of the lawyer's visit to him. Then he gave his opinion upon the practice of duelling. It was a noble, generous opinion. And then he informed her that he would much rather suffer the unmerited reproach of those who now presumed to scorn him, than to pass through life with the blood of a fellow-being upon his hands, or to meet his God direct from the suicidal duel. He closed by calling down the choicest blessings upon her head, and bidding her adieu forever!

Kate Williams sat in her boudoir when Harry's letter was handed to her, and she broke the seal with a slight curl of contempt upon her ruby lips. But as she read her countenance changed; and when she had finished she wept outright. Had Harry been at her side at that moment, she would have rested upon his bosom, and asked him to forgive her. But he was not there. She read the letter again, and then she wept more than before. She refused to see any company during the remainder of the day.

Had Kate Williams followed the instinct of her own pure soul she would have recalled Harry to her side at once, but she was governed by the opinions of others. Her father had been a warm-hearted, impetuous man, and had fought one duel; and from that father she had received the peculiar idea of chivalrous honor. Naturally proud and tenacious of her honor as a woman, she felt a chill at the thought of being united for life to one who could be called a coward. In her soul she knew that Harry had done no absolute wrong, but still, perhaps he was afraid to fight. "They will tell me," she said to herself, "that my husband will never have the courage to defend his wife's honor."

O, had she known Harry Winship truly, she could have justly said: "Woe to the living being that dares insult that man's wife, either by word or deed!" But she did not know. The cloud was upon her soul, and she blew it not away.

And so Harry Winship suffered—Kate suffered—and John Glancey believed he had crushed his opponent, and that the lovely heiress would be his wife.

The morning was dark, lowery and chill; and ere long the wind began to howl among the rocks and bluffs. Great drops of rain began to fall, and the sea became covered with foam, as the waves rose and lashed the shore in fury. Louder and louder grew the crash of the elements, and the wild sea grew more furious.

Kate Williams was pale and agitated, for she knew that her brother must be near the coast. She had received the information from the captain of a clipper which had run in ahead of the heavily loaded ship on board which her brother had taken passage.

The storm increased in power during the day, and towards the middle of the afternoon many people had assembled on the little beach below Kate's residence to view the terrible grandeur of the scene. Half a mile from the shore was a huge rock, over which the mad sea now leaped with giant power; and still further out was a low ledge which commenced at a point not far from the beach and extended out two miles into the sea in a semicircular form, the outer end bending to the southward, and being nearly opposite the little beach.

It was about six o'clock when one of the men who had come up to the mansion, discovered a hulk upon the sea at some distance in the offing. He took the spy-glass, and soon made her out to be a heavy ship, with her masts gone, and lying directly in the trough of the sea.

"Lost! Lost! O, God!" So uttered Kate as she received the intelligence of the position of the dimasted ship. "It must be the Vulcan, for no other ship would be this way! O, he is lost!"

Various were the words of consolation offered to the afflicted maiden. John Glancey was by her side, and with his arms about her fair form he bade her hope.

The night settled down dark and drear over the mad waters, and the storm abated not at all. The vivid lightning streamed through the heavens, and the loud thunder roared in the black vault. Ere long another sound came booming upon the air. It was the report of a heavy gun! At intervals of about a minute the gun was heard, and at length a crowd was collected upon the beach.

For nearly half an hour there had been no lightning, but now the vivid flash lighted up the heavens once more, and a cry of horror went up from the anxious watchers, for the ship could be plainly seen just driving towards the outer end of the long reef!

"They are lost now!" uttered an old man, who leaned heavily upon his staff. "If the ship strikes that reef she must go to pieces there, and no earthly power can help them!"

Kate Williams heard these words.

"O, sir," she cried, "I have a life-boat here! Could not some one go out in that?"

"Ah, Kate Williams, in your agony you forget the stern facts of the case. No man could live in such a sea. You can find no man here who would dare undertake such a task."

Kate's heart sank within her as she turned away. The rain had ceased falling now, and 'twas only the spray that dashed over the shivering forms upon the beach. In a few moments more the lightning streamed through the heavens again, and the cry of horror went up loud and long. The ship had struck!

"Poor fellows!" uttered the old man, "'tis all over with them now! The ship must soon go to pieces there!"

Kate gathered her shawl about her and rushed towards the spot where the life-boat had been hauled down.

"God help him now!" she cried, wringing her hands in agony. "O, Frank! Frank! my brother! Will no one go? Mr. Glancey, can you not find some stout man to go out in this boat? O, with this boat once there he might be saved!"

"Be calm, my dear Kate," urged the lawyer, taking her by the hand. "No mortal man would dare venture out there. Death stands too near at hand."

As he ceased speaking the flame of heaven glared out again; and the ship still hung upon the rocks with the sea beating furiously over her.

"Hallo! Hallo-o-o!" at this moment shouted a clear, ringing voice above the clash of the elements. "Where is the life-boat? Where is it?"

"Here—here—right by the little pier," answered a man.

"Then cut it loose! Away with it!" shouted the same voice in reply; and on the next moment Harry Winship came rushing to the spot where the crowd had gathered about the life-boat. The light from the lanterns shone in his face, and he looked like a giant at that moment. He had thrown off his coat, and placed a close oil-cloth cap upon his head.

"In the name of mercy," he cried, "why is not this boat off?"

"Would you rush on to certain death?" spoke the old man, who had followed Kate hither.

"Rush on to death?" repeated Harry, quickly. "There are a score of men in yonder ship looking death in the face, and shall we see them die thus, and not put forth a hand? No! When I am in cast off the line!"

"But you cannot pull the boat against this sea, young man."

"Then let some one come and help me!—What—none? Then these arms shall do all they can. They can but fail."

With these words Harry leaped into the boat and caught the oars which were secured in the row-locks. A projecting promontory shielded the spot where the boat lay, so that there was no difficulty in pushing off. With all his power the noble youth bent himself to the work. He had passed the stay-belt about his waist, so that the sea could not wash him away.

In a few moments the life-boat and its occupant were lost in the darkness. There was one heart upon that beach beating prayerfully for him; but he knew it not. He had not seen Kate. He had just arrived when he saw the ship upon the reef, and uttered the cry we heard.

The next flash gleamed a moment on the water. The boat was upon the top of a huge sea, and the youth was working with all his might. Down, down, the frail bark sank—a deep murmur of prayer upon the shore—and then all was dark again. Anon the heavens glowed again.

"God help him!" murmured a quivering voice. 'Twas Kate's, and her hands were tightly clasped.

Again and again the lightning came, and at each time the struggling boat was nearer to the ship. The boat was very light, and the strength which now propelled it was almost superhuman. At length the frail boat was seen directly under the stern of the ship, and some thought they saw a line thrown from the high deck.

"By heavens!" uttered the old man, "he knows how to handle that boat. He knows just where to pull, and just where he may rest."

"Ay," answered another, "he was brought up in a boat."

"So was I," resumed the old man, "but I never could have done that."

It lightened again, but no boat could be seen. Nearly an hour had now passed since the boat left the beach; and during that hour the noble doctor had labored with all his might.

Again, and again the glare of the heavens spread over the sea, and at length the life-boat was seen once more. It was coming towards the land!

"'Tis full of men!"

A giant sea arose close upon the beach, and upon it was the life-boat. On, on—one more roll—one heavy throe, and the huge sea broke upon the sand, and the boat was thrown high up upon the shore; and on the next moment living men began to leap from it. They turned, as they gained the hard footing, and lifted from the boat an inanimate form. It was Harry Winship, weak and faint.

"Frank! Frank! O, is my brother here?"

"Ho, my own Kate! God bless you, my sister!"

And on the instant a tall, stout, sea-wet man clasped the now fainting girl to his bosom.

The morning sun rose bright and clear, and many people came down to the shore of the sea to view the scene. The reef was clear now, and upon the beach lay all that was left of the noble ship. Here and there it was cast—one shapeless, separated mass of fragments.

But in the mansion above there is a brighter scene. Eight-and-twenty living souls are there, who were last night upon the deck of the ship. Not one was lost—not one! And the saviour, too, was up. He was safe and unharmed—only weak and exhausted still. He had reached the ship—received a line and secured it—and then he sank down senseless and powerless. Every nerve and every muscle had been strained to its utmost. Frank Williams—noble, generous Frank, looking in feature like his sister—had blessed him a thousand times, and all the rest had joined him.

Towards the middle of the day Harry had gone out into the library and sat down. The confusion of the party made his head ache. He had been there a few minutes when the door opened, and Kate entered. She stood before him a single moment, and then she sank down upon her knees at his feet, with her hands clasped towards him.

"Forgive me! O, forgive me!" she cried. "Forgive me, Harry, and place me in your heart once more! Forget what I said! O, forget and forgive!"

Ah, that scene was brightest of all. Half an hour afterwards, Frank found his sister, for whom he had been searching, in Harry's arms. She was happy now.

May we not suppose that John Glancey's standard of bravery sank very low after this in the estimation of those who knew all the circumstances? And everybody in the town did know them. People now knew which was the true hero; and they began to understand that a coward can be lashed into exposing his life, by anger and a desire for revenge—but a true man, never.

Before the snows of winter came, John Glancey, Esquire, left for the nearest city, while Harry Winship went to the sea-side mansion and became the brother-in-law of Frank Williams.

TRAVELLING COCKNEY NONPLUSSÉD.

Our friend, Judge W——, of Broome, is not only an American patriot in feeling, who loves his country, but a wag of the first water—and ill betides the man who engages in a badinage-encounter with him—as a certain pompous Englishman, who was a fellow passenger with him recently on the Central Railroad cars, found out somewhat to his cost. He had the bad taste to declaim in a loud voice against the beautiful country through which he was passing, and to criticise our manners, customs, etc., in the public railroad car. He presently embroiled himself with our friend.

"It is most hastonishing, sir, to a Hinglish gentleman to find the pronunciation of the Hinglish lengwidge so defective in this kentry. Heven propaw names, as of pur-a sons, pe-laces, end the like, you invariably pronounce wrong; for example: You mentioned a moment ago to your friend, speaking of the war in the East, the Cri-me-ah. Now it is not the Cri-me-ah, but the Crim-eah."

"Ah! well," said the judge, "after all, the name of a place is variously pronounced. We have just passed through the lovely village of Canandaigua. It is variously called Canandargua, Canandawga, and Can-an-da-gua. And so of Onondaga County, upon which we are about to enter. But it is different with you. It is not only the names of places which you mispronounce. In this country we call a horse a horse, but you call it a 'horse;' and you think that a man who don't know what a horse is, must be a hass!"

A laugh "like the neighing of all Tattersall's," at this sally, rang through the cars, and our Hinglishman suddenly "dried up," and never opened his lips again until the train arrived, late at night, at Albany.—Knickerbocker.

A THEATRICAL CRITIC.

Sitting in a barber's shop the other evening, says the Pittsburgh Chronicle, we overheard a conversation, something like the following, between two knights of the razor.

"Bob, has you been to the theatre to see Jim Murdock?"

"I haven't been to any place else."

"And what do you think of him? Is he as great as dey say he is?"

"To tell you the real truf, Sam, I was disappointed. Jim Murdock is a purty good actor, but he is too much like Bill Macready—he doesn't holler half loud enough, and he aint got no voice. Give me ole Guss Addams; he kin make a noise, and when he howls in Virginus, he has me across de back. Ned Forrest kin beat Guss. Nobody's got no right to play when Ned's about. He lays them all out cold. His Otello hit me hard. I've been thinking about him eber since, and the last time he was that big Ingun in Matymory, he just lifted me off my seat, and when he got through I turns round to my gal, and says I, 'Labbly Fan, Ned Forrest kin take all my old clothes.'"

The address of the Ladies' Repository says: "Kisses, like faces of philosophers, vary. Some are as hot as coal fire, some sweet as honey, some as tasteless as long-drawn soda. Stolen kisses are said to have more antineg and cream than any other sort."

I WOULD NOT WIN THEE BACK AGAIN.

BY OPHELIA M. CLOUTMAN.

I would not win thee back again,
To this poor heart of mine,
If, by a word, I could regain
Thy love, so near divine.

I would not win thee back again,
To scenes and joys once dear,
From which, thou turned in cold disdain,
Without remorse or fear.

I would not win thee back again,
From her who claims thy love;
Lest that fond heart should suffer pain,
Like to the wounded dove.

I would not win thee back again,
Though great the effort be,
Which bids my heart no more complain,
For one so false as thee.

FAMILY PORTRAITS.

BY ALICE C. BENTON.

I SAT in the dull, still, lonely house, long after the early dinner hour, waiting for some one to come in and break the oppressive silence. I would have welcomed anything that could have been called sound. Nothing to be heard during the long, quiet hours, but the ticking of the great clock, and louder still, the great cathedral notes of my own heart which beat so that I could hear every pulsation as it rang out the assurance that I "still lived."

Suddenly I seemed to have a desire to look on the family portraits which hung, not in a gallery, but all along the large, old-fashioned staircase, and the walls of the long, dim hall. The afternoon was chilly and damp, and so dark from an approaching shower, that the large room in which I had been sitting was filled with the shadows which were thrown upward from the firelight; for even at that season, the hearth at my grandfather's was never cold.

I knew the history of all these dumb yet eloquent beings of the past, save one—for many, many hours had been spent in my childhood, wandering up and down this staircase, with my little hand enfolded in my grandfather's, whose own portrait was among them—I remember how difficult it was to associate the bent and aged form, the silver hair and sunken eyes, with the broad shoulders, bright chestnut curls and flashing orbs depicted on the canvase. It was a great mystery to my childish mind; the great mystery of nature, and though recognized by us all, is yet unsolved. This strange, mysterious principle of decay, acting upon that only which is breathing and sentient; never renewing itself, but wasting year after year, while only the innate grows fresh with each returning spring!

It was not to my grandfather, however, that I owed my entire knowledge of the pictured forms. That would have been too far beyond my comprehension, that inner history of their lives. But so much time had I spent with him there, and so intimate had I become with them, for he had always called them by their names, as though they were living beings, that it only made me yearn for a deeper revelation of their lives, as I grew to appreciate such histories.

To his daughter, a woman of strong and cultivated mind, but from some sorrow in her early life, of a somewhat melancholy, perhaps morbid tendency, I learned to fill up the outline which her father had only begun; and at fifteen, the portraits had a charm for me beyond description.

"And this is the one called Margaret," I said to my aunt, as she came in and carefully wiped the light dust from the pictures.

She turned upon me with an inquiring glance.

"How do you know?" she said, quickly.

"Because grandfather always said to that picture, 'Good morning, Margaret,' sometimes it was dear Margaret," I answered.

She sighed, and tried to turn the subject, but I could see that she glanced at the portrait several times, and then at me. At length she said:

"You are really getting to be a young lady, Helena! It seems so strange. You have always seemed so very childish until now! It is only this month back that I have noticed that you are as tall as I am." She paused a moment and then resumed: "I used to think that you resembled this very picture, but your mother would never allow me to say so."

I longed to ask why, but there was something about her that prevented me; especially as I had frequently noticed with wonder, that this portrait, although the best by far in the collection, both in the face itself and the artistic merit, was placed in a corner of the staircase, in a bad light, and with every appearance of neglect or want of appreciation. It was now only that I saw it to advantage; and that was because the whole staircase was darkened by the passing thunder storm, and the sky-light, at the top of the long, upper hall, blew off, and the red lightning streamed upon the pictures. I had been gazing at them as I paced the hall, for in thunder showers I was ever unquiet and restless, and I was so often attracted to the "Margaret," that it was no marvel that at that moment my eyes should have been fixed on that face instead of any other.

That momentary gleam ! how it electrified me ; not as usual, by fear and affright, but with a new perception of its effect upon other objects. I had seen "Margaret" as I should never, probably, see her again. I never thought of the rain that streamed down in torrents through the open aperture above me. I scarcely heard Aunt Esther, who was calling "Helena!" at the very top of her shrill voice, and whom I saw, as I looked up, busy with tubs and pails to catch the inundation.

I only watched for another gleam, and I did not watch altogether in vain ; but the second was a pale, white streak that gave a strange beauty, too mournful to make me wish for it again ; and I ran into my room, shut the door, and threw myself on the bed while tears flowed fast from my eyes.

Aunt Esther came bustling in, started from her usual moody state by the passing storm. "Mercy, Helena!" she exclaimed, in a voice that came sharp and ringing to my ear, "why don't you come and help us stop the rain?"

I laughed outright through my tears. "Can you stop it, aunty?" said I.

She caught sight of the glitter on my wet cheek, and was checked in a moment from the almost angry word she was about to utter. "My poor child," she said, "you are really frightened ; lie still, dear, and I will come to you as soon as the man gets the sky-light closed again."

When, half an hour later, she came to my bedside, I was just waking from a dream, in which Aunt Esther was standing on the edge of the roof, in the act of throwing "Margaret," into a large cistern in the street, and I was holding out my hands to break its fall.

"Don't throw it, aunty!" I screamed out to her, and awoke to see her covering me with a warm blanket, for she saw that I was chilled and trembling.

"Now, aunty, tell me about that picture. I have seen it by this lightning, as I shall never see it again ; and I want to know its history."

She made some feint of not being willing, but I do believe that she was dying to relate it to me. The shower was not yet over. It was now nearly dark, and the low, black clouds still came rolling upwards, and the long, muttering sounds of the thunder were still heard, and a sharp flash of lightning came, making me wish that I could again gaze on the picture. But the sky-light was replaced, and the heavy boards were nailed down over it more securely ; for no one in that house ever thought of keeping it open to light the pictures below it.

Aunt Esther placed herself in the large flowered easy-chair, which had been my dear mother's when she was living. Her tall, thin, prim figure rose up straight and perpendicular, and her long, meagre hands were folded on her lap. Her hair was folded plainly over her forehead, and was still, in some places, dark and glossy, but just above the temples, there were two large spots of silvery whiteness, that looked as if two snow-hands had been pressed there to hide some aching beneath.

"I do not know that I can tell you all that you wish to know, Helena," she at length said. "There is little use of recalling memories that are so sad as this ; and you are too young to understand all the bearing of this unfortunate history ; but your curiosity is now excited and I will gratify it."

My heart beat high with expectation. I had read many romantic tales—but here was one that could actually be told by lips—something, too, that was connected with mystery, or my family, at least, and I experienced a new and delightful sensation. Aunt Esther seemed raised and glorified to me, as she sat there, because she was about to become to me that genius of romance, or at least, that was the half defined idea that I was unconsciously tracing out in my mind.

I cannot give any idea of it in my aunt's language, for so fearful was she of approaching it too nearly, so vaguely did she talk of persons and subjects in connection with it, and so often did I question her of matters without which being explained I could not grasp any meaning to her words, that I prefer telling it in my own abrupt and blunt way.

Margaret, then, was the sister of my grandfather, the only and idolized daughter of the family, the pet of four or five brothers all older than herself ; the graceful, beautiful, accomplished representative of the female part of the Greenwood household.

That she should be petted and idolized was not strange, for no lovelier being had ever dawned upon humanity, no brighter, happier impersonation of youth, intellect and graceful beauty ever beamed upon a household, than Margaret Greenwood.

All that wealth could procure, was lavished upon her enjoyment ; all that love could devise, was poured out like water at her feet. Throughout the household, Margaret's comfort and happiness were the engrossing themes. In trifles, as in things of magnitude, there was a positive passion to minister to her gratification. Not a dress did she hang upon her dainty little person, that was not imported especially for her use. Not an ornament graced her, that ever saw the light of an American jewel case. Copley painted her, it was true; but Copley was the prince of portrait painters at that period, and his pictures will ever be recognized as perfect in their individual expression; possessing an inimitable charm of attitude, an indescribable beauty of coloring, and though last not least, an adaptation of costume, combining the richest material with the most faultless simplicity in its shaping; re-producing only those classic models of drapery which are ever new and beautiful. There are few families which would not like to boast of ancestral paintings from the hand of Lord Lyndhurst's father.

Well, Margaret's husband must be imported, too; and when Walter Greenwood (my grandfather) returned from Edinburg, where he had finished his education, he brought with him young Leonard Bruce; and at sixteen, Margaret was betrothed to him. Never was a more perfect match to all appearance. Both were surpassingly handsome, both highly intellectual. Each had a certain individuality of look, character, expression, so different from all others around them, and so well in keeping with each other. And yet Margaret did not love him. She was blinded to her own true feelings, by the state of things around her. His sudden and evident admiration; her brother's enthusiastic friendship for him; the interest which he excited in all who saw him, gave a sort of blind compulsion to her conduct in consenting to become his wife, and she tacitly allowed the preparations for her marriage to proceed. It was celebrated with all the parade which could be brought to bear upon it; and envy itself admired what it did not dare to depreciate.

Margaret was queenly in her marriage robes; but her eye did not once turn with a confiding glance to the noble figure by her side. There was an element plainly wanting, which when present, sanctifies the simplest bridal—absent, the grandest ceremonial sinks into a falsehood.

It was a heavy stroke to the family when they found that Leonard Bruce was determined to take his wife to Scotland. They had never dreamed of it. Walter Greenwood had always supposed that he would settle in America, for Leonard had always favored the supposition. But after a few months of journeying, and a corresponding time of rest and enjoyment, he languished for his native hills, and before the autumn had ripened its golden grain, they were on their way to Scotland.

A few short letters from Margaret told them from time to time, of her prosperity, of the beauty of her Scottish home, of the sweet, poetic associations which it recalled and strengthened; but never of her happiness. Children were born in that home, whom she described with all the intensity of a mother's deep, unfailing, earnest devotion; but for the father and husband, no word had ever been written, except in the most casual and indifferent manner. After a few years, there was an evident bitterness and even contemptuousness in her slight references to him, which could not but pain those who loved her. Walter resolved to visit her, and after a few months' absence, he too returned, sad, and evidently distressed, but inexorably silent as to his sister's appearance, or apparent state of mind. Loving his sister as he did, it was not possible that he could still his troubled heart while there was a shadow over her; and finding it impossible to forbear showing some, at least, of his real feelings at home, he went to England.

He was crossing the Channel from Dover to Calais, when he observed two figures on board, one of which reminded him of Margaret. The lady was evidently disguised, for various unnecessary mufflings shrouded her person and her face was enveloped in a thick veil; but the graceful turn of her head could not be concealed, and that was Margaret's. Walter almost fainted, but in a moment he laughed at himself for his absurd fears, and withdrew without having been seen.

A second time he saw them, and she was leaning on the arm of her companion and evidently weeping. Her hand pressed to her eyes, outside of her thick veil, looked so much like his sister's! And yet again he suffered himself to be in the presence of this mysterious group, without ascertaining if he knew them.

But this man! what could he have in common with his gentle sister Margaret? It was true, there was a degree of gentleness in his evident care of her, in his attempts to hush her tears, in the gentle folding of his arm about her waist, as if to protect her; but as he rose to his feet to order water to be brought her, Walter saw that he was one of those tall, gaunt, stern-looking men, such as are rarely seen at their full height and somewhat coarse and massive frames, except in Scotland. What could he be to Margaret Bruce?

Walter attributed his own fancies to his disturbed feelings about Margaret. His ideas were all the more unpleasant, because he could give them no form. His picture of Margaret's life had not risen into any shape, but a dim, foreboding consciousness of evil filled his mind; and when he landed in Calais, he was nervous, worried and exhausted by his own vague and restless emotions.

A few weeks in Paris had a sedative effect upon his mind. The thoughtless, careless gaiety of the Parisians infected him also, and with youth, health and wealth to enjoy, he became the life of the circles in which he moved.

One night, at a masked ball, he experienced a renewal of his uneasiness, at the sight of a figure whose height reminded him of the Scotchman. Again beside him was the lady whose motions had seemed so much like Margaret's, and again he saw her hand. It was like his sister's, and had the same shell-shaped nails which in hers had been so often admired. There was not a single jewel upon it, not even a circlet of plain gold, but high up on her arm, as it was revealed by the falling back of the sleeve, was a broad band of gold, so pure and fine that it needed no clasp to retain it in its place. Walter remembered that he had folded just such a band around his sister's arm on the night of her marriage, and she had playfully promised him that it should be always worn.

Himself closely concealed by his mask, he availed himself of her companion's momentary absence to address her in English. His first accents seemed to penetrate her to the heart, for she uttered a faint shriek and fell to the floor. A dense crowd thickened about her, effectually barring the entrance of the tall figure which stood by the door. He had apparently no apprehension that the lady who was fainting was his companion, and he made no attempt to pass. Had he done so, it would not have been easy to prevent him, for his powerful frame could have forced a way through the crowd of agile and slender Parisians, with small effort on his part. Walter tore off the lady's mask, and the long, beautiful hair fell down in rippling waves below her waist. It was Margaret! Without waiting for her to revive, he took her in his arms, bore her, unresisted, to the street, and placed her in the first carriage that offered. She did not awake from that death-like swoon until she was carried to a chamber; and then she revived to see only Walter. He forbore to question her then, but waited until she was fully restored, and a violent burst of grief had relieved her. Then she sat in calmness until he should speak to her. She did not dare to ask him a question, but her eyes watched the door, as if she expected some one to enter.

"He will never come, Margaret, you will never see him more," said Walter; "or if he indeed should enter here, I would kill him upon the threshold."

Margaret shuddered; and then she rose from the bed, and falling on her knees before her brother, she faltered out her long, sad confession, her penitence and her sorrow. They were words that burned into that fond and proud brother's heart most deeply, but they were never again uttered by her, to any human being, and never repeated by him. He crossed the seas again, with the wreck of what was his sister, and bore her to his home once more. Leonard Bruce and his children were there! He could not bear the solitude of his desecrated home, and he had come to leave his little ones with those who would love them, and then to become a wanderer.

Margaret was dying. It was touching to witness her meeting with her children; but to Leonard, she was impenetrably silent. Melted by her sufferings; by the approach of her death which seemed now so inevitable; by the love he had lavished on her and could not now subdue; by the perfect, the wondrous beauty which stole over her face, he poured out his forgiveness and his assurance of his returned affection. She heard him, and turning her eyes to the wall, she uttered a single word—"Hector." It was the last.

Leonard Bruce and Walter left the country again together, and wandered in foreign lands for two years. When they returned, the children were transferred to their father's care again, for Margaret's parents no longer lived; and he had brought home to them a second mother; an English girl, poor, of simple habits, and only beautiful because she was sweet-tempered and unassuming; and to her watchful and tender love, the orphans owed unutterable but deeply felt thanks. Her picture hangs on the staircase beside that of her husband. I have only one thing more to add. My quiet, melancholy, sober Aunt Esther, was the daughter of Margaret Bruce!

SINGULAR INTERPOSITION.

A lady had a tame bird, which she was in the habit of letting out of its cage every day. One morning, as it was picking crumbs of bread off the carpet, her cat, who always before showed great kindness for the bird, seized it on a sudden and jumped with it in her mouth upon the table. The lady was much alarmed for the safety of her favorite, and turning about, instantly discovered the cause. The door had been left open, and a strange cat had just come into the room. After turning it out, her own cat came down from her place of safety, and dropped the bird, without doing it the smallest injury.—Salem Register.

The poor man has health, a good appetite, and sleeps soundly at night. The rich man has his cares, his headaches, and his heart aches; and if the sum of human enjoyment could be exactly measured by some sort of moral thermometer, we should find that real happiness is pretty equally distributed, and that there is little cause for any man to repine at his own lot, or envy that of his neighbor.

I THINK OF THEE.

BY L. E. GOODMAN.

When beside the streamlet musing
On the past, the golden past,
And the brilliant scenes of memory
O'er my soul come rushing fast,
Like sunbeams o'er a gloomy sea,
Then, Lizzie, then I think of thee.

When day's sweet, departing glories
On the west their foot-prints leave,
And the stars, like pearly tear-drops,
Steal adown the cheek of eve,
Then sadness turns the golden key
Within the gate of memory.

When the silvery tongue of music
Holds me listening to it long,
I get dreaming, like a Peri
Harkening to some bright world's song,
Until my soul, unconsciously,
Gets free, and dove-like, flies to thee.

When Aurora, rosy-blushing,
Flings abroad her royal pearls,
And her banner, striped with sunlight,
In the Orient unfurls,
The sense of beauty steals o'er me,
Then, Lizzie, e'er I think of thee.

When the world grows cold and scornful,
Filling all my breast with grief,
And I feel there's none to love me—
None to give my heart relief,
Then some sweet spirit guarding me,
Directs my thoughts to think of thee.

THE TWO BRIDALS
IN THE VILLAGE CHURCH.

BY EMMA CARRA.

"I wish I had some money to buy me a ball; it is ball time now and all the boys have them," said Albert Griswold, gently winding his arms around his mother's neck, with his eyes turned towards his father, who half reclined on the sofa, wrapped up in his costly breakfast suit, and occasionally puffing from his aromatic cigar blue wreaths of smoke.

"Ask father," whispered the mother, in his ear; "he has plenty of money, you know, and I guess he will give you enough to buy you a ball."

"No, you ask him, mother; because I am afraid he will scold me for giving my other to Willie Mumford."

The father's eyes were on the morning paper he held in his hand, but he heard the conversation that passed between his wife and child, and though he made an effort to the contrary, he glanced in the direction where his son hung so caressingly on his mother's neck, just in season to catch the eyes of both. Leaning a little further forward, he buried his fingers in his vest pocket for a moment, and then drew out a piece of silver, saying:

"Here, Albert; now when you get another ball, see if you can keep it, and not give it to the first ragged urchin you meet in the street without one."

"Willie Mumford isn't an urchin, father," said Albert, timidly, "he is a good boy, and sits right side of me in school, and sometimes he helps me get my lessons."

Mr. Griswold seemed a little disconcerted for a moment, but he soon rallied, and without making any answer of reproof or otherwise, he held the paper a little nearer to his face, and went on with his reading.

"I have got twenty-five cents, mother," whispered Albert, as he again stepped back to his parent's side; "that will buy me a ball and a top, too," and for a moment he expressed his joy by being very profuse with his kisses, and then before one could be returned he bounded towards the door that led to the front hall. Mrs. Griswold gave a light tap on the carpet with her embroidered slipper; Albert looked back, wonderingly, and she made a slight movement of her hand for him to return and kiss his father. The boy hesitated an instant, and then his smile died away and he went noiselessly back, and without removing his hands from his side, he leaned his head forward and touched his lips to his father's cheek; but the latter didn't seem to notice it, so the boy turned softly away, and in another moment he was in the street on his way to the toy store on the corner. When the echo of Albert's foot-fall died away, the wife left her seat by the grate and went over to the sofa where her husband was sitting. There was a little more moisture on her lashes than Nature requires in her healthy mood, but still she was silent until her husband had finished the perusal of his paper, then she said with a forced cheerfulness:

"I wish, husband, that you would try to be a little more affectionate towards Albert; it is so necessary for his happiness to be loved."

"Well, I don't know but it is; but I think it is rather small business for a man to be fussing over children: I believe in leaving such things for the women. If I provide you with the handsomest house in this fashionable street and keep you and the children furnished with spending money, why, that is my part without making a fool of myself by hugging and kissing the juveniles. But let me tell you, Alice, that you are spoiling that boy by making such a baby of him ; but then he is just like you, after all," and Mr. Griswold threw down the paper and arose from his seat to make preparations to go to his office, and half an hour afterwards he was in State Street discussing business with others, who like himself thought that a bird could but be happy in a golden cage, though it stood where the sun of love seldom penetrated.

When Mrs. Griswold heard her husband close the front door, she buried her face in the soft pillow that lay on the sofa, and wept : she scarcely knew why, for she was surrounded by every comfort that money could buy, and was looked upon in society as one of the favored in fortune. A careless spectator would have deemed it ungrateful in the wife as she reclined amid these costly surroundings, to weep for what seemed to be imaginary woes ; but seldom can the superficial observer penetrate beyond the surface, and thus it was in Mrs. Griswold's case, for as those hot tears coursed slowly down her fair cheek, her mind went back to her cottage home that nestled in summer amid green leaves near the roadside, with broad fields and dark woodlands in the background, where from childhood up to the hour of her departure from home as a bride, she had ever been wont to lay her head upon her mother's breast when weary or sad, and receive sympathy, a sure antidote for earth's cares. And she remembered, too, a pale, still youth who sat in the village church and gazed on her on the morning of her bridal. When younger, he had broken for her the snow path in winter, while on their way to school ; had helped her to master the difficult lessons, and often sheltered her from all blame when the fault was hers.

But he was poor ; his widowed mother only owned the little cottage in which she lived, and where her son cultivated the small garden ; but he never seemed poor to Alice, until the wealthy Mr. Griswold stopped at her mother's one day to enquire the way to a rich neighbor's dwelling, and from that time she forgot all she had ever said to Albert Marriott, when he told her how much he loved her, and with joy his mother looked forward to the time when her sweet songs would be sung in his own little cottage ; for the married man came again. As his coffers were full, he wished to ornament his possessions, and never had he seen an ornament so much to his mind as Alice Clafin ; so when he rode to his friend's country-seat again, he called at the cottage and convinced Mrs. Clafin of his opulence and popularity. The widow's mind was dazzled with the tableau of wealth that he presented, and from this time she urged her daughter to become his wife and remove to the city. At first Albert timidly expostulated, and pointed to the gilded cages that held their wealthy neighbors' birds, debarred from freedom to roam in their native element, but all arguments were overruled by the mother and daughter. Money was the magic power that was to bring all happiness, and Albert returned to his lonely home to brood over disappointment. But the young man felt no pang of jealousy ; he hoped, he prayed that she whom he loved so fondly might be happier in another home than she ever could have been in his ; and when he saw the villagers with happy smiles, flocking towards the church, he joined the throng, and with a heart well nigh bursting, he witnessed the ceremony that separated him forever from Alice. But the proud, new-made husband knew not his secret ; so as one of her rustic friends he was allowed to again press his now colorless lips to the cheek of the bride. Albert knew that it must be the last, and it was an icy touch, that caused the rose tint for a moment to disappear ; but the gathering group of childhood acquaintances rushed forward to greet the fair young creature, and none saw the corpse-like face depart, as at the threshold it stopped for a last, lingering look ; none save the mother and bride, and with them it was stamped indelibly. Albert returned to his home and his rustic employment ; but his shadow crossed the threshold of Mrs. Clafin's cottage no more, and she and Mrs. Marriott seldom saw each other.

No rustic friend of Alice's childhood was invited to visit the bride in her city home, for the cold, proud glance of the new-made husband was upon her, and with a formal good-by, they separated. For a time, Alice thought that she was happy in her new home, though she was often reminded that she must be a little more dignified when company was present, and avoid all country phrases, and never speak of vegetation or nature, for city people didn't talk upon such subjects.

"What shall I talk about ?" timidly inquired Alice.

"The fashions and the general news of the day," was the reply. "Make yourself acquainted with fashionable society, and learn from it, and don't depend on me to teach or entertain you."

But everything was novel that now surrounded the village belle, so she tried to persuade herself that she was happy, nor missed the old familiar smiles that used to greet her. The mother seldom came, and when she did a hin was always given to the daughter that she had better avoid publicity ; her ways were so old-fashioned that their acquaintances would think her very odd. And so time passed until the bright-eyed Albert was welcomed to their home, and then the mother named the boy, for the sound of the name still lingered on her ear like some sweet note of music, the echo of which thrills long after the outward vision of the band has departed. Mr. Griswold knew no reason why his wife should fancy that name more than another, and Albert was the name agreed upon; and thus time whirled on, changing all on which it had power to act.

The morning when our story opens Albert had passed his ninth birthday. A little sister had come and gone since he first saw the light, and now Mrs. Griswold clung to her boy with still more tenacity. It brought severe pangs to her affectionate heart, as she saw his father turn coldly and impatiently away from his warm caresses, and worship the idol for which she had been persuaded to marry him, and it seemed as if her heart would burst in its eagerness to find some one, loving and worthy to be loved, to whom she might unbosom her griefs, and reveal that fashionable smiles lit up by gas light had no charms for her; that rosewood and velvet, gold and popularity but made her look back to the cottage by the roadside, and stamp indelibly the contrast to the disadvantage of the gaudy home. And so Mrs. Griswold reflected and wept, for she was alone, now, and might indulge her grief without giving pain to her darling boy, who was almost always by her side. Servants came in and removed the silver from the breakfast table, and as their mistress half reclined on the luxurious sofa, with her head turned from them, with a sigh they returned to their labors, wishing that they could be as free from toil and care as she who employed them.

With the first breath of the keen, frosty air, Albert forgot that his father did not return his kiss, for the love that his father might have shared, was all lavished on his mother, save when he furnished him with silver to buy a new toy, and then, as his caresses met with no return, they were soon ended, and the object almost forgotten, and thus it was now, as the beautiful boy tripped with an elastic step to the variety store on the corner. But he stopped suddenly, as he came opposite the large window, for there stood Hettie Vinton, looking so wishfully through the large panes, with her little bare, red feet pressing the stones that glistened in the early sun-light, as it came down over the house tops.

Hettie held up first one little pink foot and then the other, as if to warm it by the side of her torn pantalette, and then she hugged closer the old faded shawl that had undergone this process until it was tightly wrapped around her neck, leaving her little plump shoulders exposed to the keen air. Albert stopped short in his fast walking, or rather skipping, and eyed the little grotesque figure before him. Her hood but half concealed her soft brown curls, one of which was blown by the wind hither and thither, as it escaped through a rent in the back of her torn hood.

In spite of the little vexations at home, Albert was in a merry mood, for a small portion which seemed large to him of the magic key to mirth was in his hand; so he stepped nearer the little child of want, and then with a roguish smile he looked into her face, while with his right hand he gave a sly pull to the stray curl. Hettie didn't seem to notice him, so intent was she in gazing on the smoking loaves that the baker had just left within, and the sugared cakes that lay heaped up beside them. Albert felt a little ashamed of what he had done, for he had violated a precept that his mother had taught him: to be respectful to inferiors in wealth, and he was glad that she had not noticed him, and yet he could not bear to pass in without her looking at him, so as he came round on the other side, he extended his foot, which was encased in a new boot, and gently touched Hettie's little bare toes as they came to the cold flags on that side to relieve the other benumbed members. The light pinch did not hurt Hettie's toes, but it reminded her that some one had observed that she was barefoot, and how impossible it was for her to get a new pair of shoes, and when on looking up she beheld the handsome Albert Griswold whom she met every morning on his way to school, her cheeks turned even a brighter pink than those little cold feet; but she said nothing, she only pulled her old hood a little further over her eyes, gave another jerk to the short skirt of her frock, which almost severed it from the waist, as if to hide her feet, and then she pressed her face so close to the glass that the roguish boy could not see it; so he waited a moment on the step to see if she did not look up, and as she did not, he passed in, still wishing that she would speak to him.

"O, how nice and warm it is in here!" thought Albert. "I wish she would come in and warm her;" and then he turned and beckoned for her to come in, and now he saw that she was crying. "Perhaps it was I that made her cry," he said, mentally; so without asking for the toys he went out again, and this time he stepped politely to her side and said:

"Come into the warm shop, Hettie; it is so nice in there, you can warm you."

"Darsn't," replied the child; "they don't let folks in there that haven't got any money."

"O, yes they will, Hettie, there is Mrs. Nash in there now, and I heard her say she didn't come to buy anything."

"But she is dressed nice, and they know that she has got money, if she don't buy bread and cakes with it."

"Do you want a cake, Hettie? If you do, come right in here and I will buy you one," and Albert showed her the bright coin he held in his hand, and he thought that he didn't care if he didn't have any ball if Hettie would only stop crying and not look so sad.

The little girl was ashamed to say she did want the cake, and too hungry to say no; and as the boy looked into her sad little face, he forgot that he was dressed in broadcloth and she in rags, so he took her hand in his and led her into the store. As Hettie entered the store, the owner looked at her in such a manner that if Albert had not been with her she would have run out; but the boy led her to the stove, and then called for some cakes and presented them to her.

"I wish you had some shoes, Hettie," said Albert, "why don't you get some? It is too cold now to go without shoes."

"Mother has been too poor since father died."

"What will you do when the snow comes?"

"Mother says she shall be dead, then," said Hettie, laying down the cake and sobbing so loud that the shopkeeper looked up with a threatening air. Hettie looked towards the door as if she would like to make her escape, but her little protector stood between her and it and whispered:

"You must get warm before you go; but what makes you think your mother will die?"

"O, she is so sick and the doctor don't come there now, for mother told him that she couldn't pay him; so she must die, and then I shall have to go to the poor-house. They have shoes there, but they are very heavy," and Hettie's cake lay untasted in her lap, as she crouched by the stove with her sorrowful face.

Albert no longer cared about the ball, for he had known little Hettie a long time; that is, he had met her almost every day when he was on his way to school, and she was passing to her school-house in an opposite direction, and how often he had wished, when the baby was alive, that she would grow up and look just like the prim little Hettie; for it was only lately that she had gone barefoot and worn such tattered clothes, so now as he saw her grief, he bent low and whispered in her ear: "You shan't go to the poor house—my mother hasn't got any little girl, and I will ask her to let you come and live with us," and then he took the coin he had received in exchange when he purchased the cakes, slyly dropped it into her lap, and told her to buy something to carry home to her mother. The little girl hesitated to take it, and a deep blush overspread her features, but Albert urged her, saying he could get plenty more; so she accepted it with a secret joy at the thought of what she could purchase for her mother.

Hettie now began to tuck her ringlets under her hood and get ready to step out again on the flags. All the customers were busy at the counter with their backs towards the children, so the boy drew from Hettie's shoulders the faded shawl and shook it out wider, and just as he was in the act of replacing it, his father entered the store to get a new supply of cigars. Mr. Griswold did not speak immediately, but listened and watched for a moment, and then stepping across the floor, ere Albert knew he was there, seized him rudely by the collar and bade him purchase his toys and go home, nor spend his time talking with beggars. The little girl was frightened, and scarcely knowing what she did, sprang towards the door, while the coin that the rich man's son had given her, rolled in various directions across the floor. She did not stop to gather it up, but ran along the frosty stones as if she were fleeing from the just punishment of crime.

"Have you bought the ball you came in for?" sternly inquired the father.

"No," answered the boy, timidly, "I don't want any ball."

"Then where is the money I gave you?"

Albert hesitated.

"I guess what he didn't spend for cakes for the little girl, is on the floor," said the shopkeeper, going around the counter to pick up the coin that had fallen, and handing it to the rich customer.

"Just like him," said the father, receiving the coin and looking at his son sharply; then turning to the other, he added:

"I don't mind parting with the money, for you know, Mr. Brush, that I give away a great deal in the course of a year for benevolent purposes."

"Certainly, sir, certainly; I know you do," returned the other, and he wanted to add: "But not in sums less than a hundred dollars, so that you can see your name in the papers next day;" but he was afraid of losing one of his best cigar customers, so he continued: "I can't blame you for not wanting your son to speak to those beggars, they are very designing even when they are very young."

"Hettie isn't," said Albert, turning very red, "nor she isn't a beggar neither."

"Hush!" said the father, and in a few moments more Mr. Griswold went out, taking his son with him, telling him to go home and not ask him for any more money for a month, for he must learn better than to squander it on beggars. Albert kept back all his tears until he reached that luxurious room where but a short time before he had left his mother, and when he saw that she, too, was unhappy, he wound his arms around her neck and told her of all that had transpired since he went out, and begged her if Hettie's mother died, to bring her to their home and let her be his sister.

"I will think of it," said the mother, affectionately, as she wiped the tears from her yet girlish face, and arose to ascertain if it were not near the time that he should go to school.

A few hours later in the day, Mr. Griswold was seated at his desk; he had dropped his pen, and was so engaged in thought, that for a moment he did not notice that the little heroine of the morning's incident stood before him.

"What do you want?" said the rich man, giving her a cold glance."

"I came to tell you, sir, that my mother wants to see you."

Mr. Griswold sat a moment in silence, and then he drew out his pocket-book, extracted a number of notes and reached them to the child, who grasped them eagerly and with a light bound sprang towards the door; but the heavy latch had closed so tightly that Hettie's strength was insufficient to open it. Mr. Griswold looked for a few seconds on vacancy and then he arose and lifted the latch, but he still lingered with the door closed, and extending his hand he said:

"Let me look at the notes again, little girl."

Hettie handed them back, and in another moment he returned them to his pocket-book, saying:

"Tell your mother if she wants to see me she must come here, and I can't spare any money now."

"My mother is too sick," sobbed the child; but Mr. Griswold didn't seem to observe what she said, he only went back to his desk and read his newspaper upside down, with a flushed face, and the office boy rejoiced when the Old South clock released him at noon from the sharp tones of his employer's voice and so the day wore away. * * *

"Will you go, mother?" said Albert, looking up earnestly in her face.

Mrs. Griswold sat thoughtfully gazing into the grate for a moment, and then answered yes, and in a short time, with Albert's hand clasped within her own, she walked quickly down the street, and then struck off into a narrow alley and ascended three or four flights of stairs. Ere Mrs. Griswold reached the top of the last flight, she half turned to go back, but her boy sprang past her and threw back the door that closed the invalid's room.

Mrs. Griswold, unknown to her husband, had often visited the poor, and supplied them with many comforts; but no scene that she had ever witnessed had equalled this in intensity of wretchedness; but we will not stop to describe it, save that the mother lay dying, with none near but her little Hettie. Mrs. Vinton's lips were sealed to be unclosed no more, but the windows of her soul were open, and through them she looked out upon the group, and manifested by signs the hope that the mother of the boy would be kind to her child, nor let her perish with want. Mrs. Griswold promised, and a week later the orphan child was furnished with comfortable clothes and sent to a kind neighbor's house to remain until she could be permanently provided for.

When Hettie's long curls were combed out smoothly, and her feet encased in neat shoes, with becoming garments adorning her graceful form, Mr. Griswold would gladly have adopted the child as her own, but her husband would not consent to it, and when she mentioned the name of the child, he bade her never speak to him again concerning her, but let her go and take her chance with other paupers.

It had been several years now since Mrs. Clafin had visited her daughter; she knew she was looked upon by the husband as an unwelcome guest, and in her letters she pleaded growing infirmities as the cause of her absence. After Mrs. Griswold had spoken of the adoption of Hettie, and been so abruptly refused, a new idea seemed to enter her brain, and a few weeks after she informed her husband that she should like to visit the cottage where she spent her childhood, and amid old scenes spend a short time with her mother.

Although Mr. Griswold seemed rather reluctant to have her go, he consented, and supplied her liberally with money, for he wished to show the rustics of her native place, how superior had been her lot in life. With joy did the rich man's wife hasten the preparations, and in a few days she was ready with her idol boy to visit the home of her childhood. When the carriage drove up to the door and Mrs. Griswold and her son stepped in, she gave orders for the driver to stop in a street she designated, and when this order was obeyed, Hettie came out from a low, brown house, so changed in costume and expression that it would have been hard to recognize her now as the former Hettie, with her chilled feet, at the shop-keeper's window. Mrs. Griswold loved the child, and it was not strange that she should, for she had mild blue eyes and soft brown curls like her own dear babe, and had the little Alice lived, her age would have been about the same. Albert also loved the orphan child, although recently he had not seen her, for his mother did not wish to teach him to deceive his father. Mrs. Griswold took Hettie to the home of her childhood, and after the greeting was over, presented the orphan to her mother, saying :

"Keep her, mother, for my sake, and as she grows older she will watch over you, and I trust be to you what my situation in life forbids my being—a devoted daughter."

From this time Hettie knew no more of want, for she seemed to supply a place at the hearthstone that had long been vacant, so she received all the privileges of a daughter and soon became the pet of the neighborhood. Mrs. Claffin called her by her own maiden name, Louisa Elliot, and among new scenes and pleasant companions, her former situation faded from her memory.

How natural looked the scenes of childhood to the city wife ! but old emotions of happiness had gone forever. The birds sang as sweetly now as formerly, but they brought discord to her ear, for their songs reminded her of the long years that had intervened since she, too, sang in glee. He who had loved her so fondly in years gone by still occupied the cottage with his mother, and when he met her, it was with the same kind smile ; but well she knew that he thought her ungrateful in the past. And so the time passed, until she returned to her city home, to wear a smiling face before those with whom she felt no sympathy.

And now, reader, we will imbibe the spirit of the day, and skim along the track of time with lightning speed, nor stop till we have reached fifteen years beyond the morning that little Hettie, then about five years old, crouched with her naked feet at the stove in the variety store, and talked with the little boy in broadcloth. There is to be another wedding in the little village church now, the tall spire of which points upward just the same, but the moss has gathered thicker on the roof, and another set of maidens attend the bridal. The couple in point of wealth are much the same ; the bride has no dowry save her beauty and noble heart, but the one of her choice has enough for both ; or if poverty should become their lot they can still be happy, for gold is but a secondary object with both. The couple we speak of are Albert Griswold and Hettie, or Louisa as she is now called. Mrs. Claffin's cottage has been her home ever since she first breathed the pure air of the country, and as years swept by and Albert visited the little homestead of his grandmother, his love for the beautiful orphan grew more intense, until it ended in a marriage at the village church. Albert's father had not seen his son's bride since he took from her the notes in his office, for when Mrs. Griswold saw how prejudiced her husband was against the child, she ceased to speak her name, and he had never visited his mother-in-law since the orphan dwelt with her. As he grew older, he became so much engrossed in business that he seldom left the city and cultivated but few friendships, save such as he could turn to some pecuniary advantage. Mrs. Griswold knew how devotedly her son was attached to the one of his choice, and as her own happiness had been sacrificed for money, she did not wish his to be wrecked in the same manner. Knowing that his father would never consent to his becoming the husband of one who was poor, several weeks passed after the bridal in the village church ere Albert informed him that another had been added to the family. Mr. Griswold's first inquiry was, "Is she rich ?" and when he was answered that she had a large fortune in prospect, he made but few more inquiries, only slightly reproving his son for his boyish folly in keeping the affair so secret.

When the bride took up her residence in her father-in-law's family, and was introduced to him as Mrs. Griswold, he started and turned a little pale, and a few days after he asked his wife if she had ever heard what became of Mrs. Vinton's orphan child.

"Did you not forbid my mentioning her name in your presence ? and why should you expect me to trace her history farther ?" said the wife.

"True, but I—" he did not finish the sentence, but mused for a few moments in silence, and then went out. From this time Mr. Griswold seemed more thoughtful and less intent on making money, and then he told his son that he was becoming tired of so much care, and in future Albert must take more of the responsibility of the office. Hettie, from the day of her entrance into the wealthy man's home, seemed to breathe into it a new air of happiness, for it was her study to please ; perhaps she was more anxious because she knew that the truth must some day be known that she was a penniless orphan ere her marriage. A year had nearly sped by when Mr. Griswold spoke again of Mrs. Vinton's child. His wife made no immediate reply, and so the husband continued :

"Alice," he said, "I have made inquiries concerning that child, and I can learn nothing save that she was taken away from her miserable home, where her mother died, by a lady, to be educated and cared for. Now if Albert had not told me that Louisa has a mother living, I should think that his wife was a child of—of my old friend, William Vinton, for she looks very much like Mrs. Vinton in former days."

"And was that wretched mother the wife of your friend, and you so loath to befriend the child?"

"He was my friend once, Alice; but—but—" and he who through long years had worshipped gold, seemed now subdued, for white hairs had begun to thicken over his brow, and he felt that life would not endure forever, and as he neared the home prepared for all, remorse was busy at his heart and he could not smother its fires any longer. Mrs. Griswold, with woman's quick penetration, saw that her husband's heart was softened, and taking a seat by his side, said gently:

"With the exception of you and I, Louisa has no parents save an adopted mother;" and then she gradually revealed everything. Commencing with her early marriage, she told him how she had yearned for tenderness, and how unhappy she had been when he made money his idol, to the neglect of home and the duties of social life, and that she could not bear that Albert's happiness should be sacrificed in order that he should be united to a wealthy bride; and knowing that in every respect, save the lack of money, Louisa was one whom he would approve, she had not opposed her son's desire to marry her whom he had loved from boyhood up. Mr. Griswold was very pale during the recital, and yet he strove to be calm; but though he loved his son's wife, he could not give up at once the pride that had lingered around him for so many years, and now the inward struggle caused the pallid features. When the wife had done speaking, he arose, and for the first time in long years, pressed his lips to her cheek, saying:

"I do not blame you, Alice—God is just; but I cannot talk with you longer now;" and he seemed like one who makes a giant effort to appear calm when the heart is deeply moved, and then he added: "Tell no one of this interview at present, and in a few days you shall know more."

From this time, the change in Mr. Griswold's manner gradually increased, until his wife ceased to regret the love of former days, the object of which had long since settled down in life, the partner of one who was contented to share his home and once divided heart. Mrs. Clafin was sent for by her daughter, to make them a visit, and from that time her home was with her daughter and her adopted child. After several weeks passed by, Mrs. Griswold learned from her husband, that in early life, ere his marriage, William Vinton and he were intimate friends, and one evening, at a gaming table, they had played for money, when Mr. Vinton being successful, and getting excited by the play, said he would stake two thousand dollars, his all, against the same amount, with any one in the room. Mr. Griswold laid down the sum required and won. His friend was penniless. From that time Mr. Vinton took the downward road; misfortunes crowded thick upon him; his two children sickened and died, and in the midst of poverty the little Hettie was born. At length, in despair, he died a suicide. He had told his wife all, and after her husband's death, she in her poverty, begged Mr. Griswold to restore a part of the sum he had won; but he refused, and left her with her child to suffer, while he and his young wife lived luxuriously on the gains made from such a capital. The timid Mrs. Vinton had never sought his home, or she might have been more successful; and so she died, as the reader has seen, in want; but if the eyes could express it, she was not devoid of hope that her child would be provided for, when she saw the benevolent little boy whom Hettie had that morning told her of, standing with his mother at her bedside. Although Mrs. Vinton had ventured to send for Mr. Griswold, he went not to the dying one, and years after, the scene at the office was remembered only as a dream.

When Mr. Griswold saw that his wife and son took an interest in the little Hettie, he strove to crush it from the first, for fear that all would become public, and his wife and friends despise him for his baseness in retaining the money that left his friend a beggar. This was the sole cause of his dislike to the orphan; but Mrs. Griswold kept her husband's secret, so that his son and wife thought that his only objection was the lack of money on her part, and when this was reconciled, life glided smoothly with all.

GO IT WHILE YOU'RE YOUNG.

"Go it while you're young, for when you get old you can't." Exactly—go it—but not after misery; go it, but not after wine; go it, but not after dissipation, folly or vice, for when you get old you can't; and if you do you want, for you will never get old! But go it—go it after your business; go it after virtue; go it after that pretty girl whom you want to marry; go it after these, for when you get old you can't, and there will be no use either of your going it then, for you will have health, wealth, honor, a good old woman and children to bless you, and you can take your ease! But until you get old, go it after these things.—Philadelphia Courier.

THE REAPERS.

BY MRS. R. T. ELDRIDGE.

By the margin of a fountain they have lain their storkies by,
They are resting on the greensward with their loaded wagons nigh;

They're a merry band of reapers, singing through the livelong day,

Their homes are filled with plenty and their barns with grain and hay.

Now they fill their earthen vessels with cold water to the brim,

For they know the cooling beverage will strengthen every limb;

Proud, honest, free and happy, ever singing at their toil, Telling whilst they reap together how they love to till the soil.

I have watched them from my lattice through the livelong summer's day,

I have seen them coming homeward with their loads of grain and hay:

Seen them quaffing from the fountain where the water's sparkle clear,

No poison lingers in its depths to fill their hearts with fear.

See, now they're coming homeward with a song upon their lips:

"Cold water, clear cold water, from the fountain bright that drips—

Cold water, clear cold water, free from every spot or stain,
It never caused a mother's heart to throb with grief or pain."

Think of the feeble colonists that knelt on Plymouth's
soil,

'Neath skies that frowned above them, asking God to bless their toil;

Now, a merry band of reapers, when the clouds betoken rain,

Can sing and talk together whilst they garner up the grain.

How I love to watch the reapers when returning from their toil,

They are strong, athletic youths—noble sons of Freedom's
soil;

Now they're drinking from the fountain, shouting all the while with glee,

"Cold water is our beverage—'tis stainless, pure and free."

TRUE AND FALSE BENEVOLENCE.

BY FLORA E. MORTON.

"CAN you not wait a half-hour and keep Eddy quiet, while I make some bread?"

"Why, no indeed! Mary, how can you ask such a question, when you know they think that old Mrs. Howland is just gone?"

"Well, there are others to render all necessary assistance, and besides, I only asked you to help me for a short time."

"But if everybody said so, who would go?"

"Let me tell you, Julia, I think it would be far more benevolent for you to stay at home this morning and assist me, than to spend your time with Mrs. Howland, who has plenty of friends to bestow all the attentions required."

"You and I do not agree in our ideas of benevolence;" and Julia, with a curl of her rosy lip, departed on her errand of mercy!

The two speakers were Mary and Julia Carlton, the elder daughters of a respectable farmer in one of our New England villages. Their mother had died when they were of the ages of twelve and nine, and their father, after five years of mourning for the bride of his youth, had married a fair, gentle woman, who felt a tender love and warm interest for the motherless girls.
Three years of wedded life had bestowed upon them two children, Rose—a little girl of two—and Eddy the baby. Mary Carlton, the elder daughter, was a fair, gentle girl, who had inherited her mother's amiable, retiring disposition;
but Julia was more impulsive and excitable—never looking ahead for the consequences of any act. She possessed an inordinate love of admiration and flattery, and hesitated not to use deception or "plan," as she called it, to obtain it.

A young physician had recently come into the little village of Melrose, and being handsome, agreeable and talented, he very soon became the centre of attraction. Smiles wreathed rosy lips, and bright eyes sparkled, when young Dr. Vale made his appearance in the village circles. The gossips, of course, had plenty of occupation, and many extra cups of tea were drank in consequence of his debut!

Julia Carlton determined that her charms should win this "bright, particular star;" and she revolved many schemes in her mind. But none seemed particularly feasible, until, on one bright afternoon in May, a young friend dropped in to see the sisters. In the course of conversation, she said:

"I have understood that Dr. Vale is a church member, and very devoted; and he said to Mrs.
Hawthorne, the other day, that his wife must have the bump of benevolence fully developed.
So, girls, look out; I fear none of us will be good enough for him! But I must go; so adieu!"

Julia sat thoughtfully by the window for a short time; then catching up her white sun-bonnet, she wended her way to the house of Mrs.
Howland, a neighbor, who was very low with a lingering disease. Kind friends had soothed her hours of pain, and every attention had been bestowed upon her; but this did not prevent Julia Carlton from offering her services to "watch" during the night with her. It excited some surprise among the older ladies, because of her usual giddiness, and some affirmed that she was too inexperienced and volatile to be trusted, but finally decided she should remain a part of the night with an older lady. She did so; and on leaving in the morning, she encountered Dr. Vale at the door, who seemed somewhat surprised, yet pleased to meet her, and she tripped home with a bounding heart.

Thenceforth her visits were very frequent at Mrs. Howland's, and the unsuspecting old lady blessed her for her apparent benevolence, little thinking that a more powerful motive than the pure, Christlike desire of doing good actuated her! Thus matters went on for several weeks, until the village people began to remark upon Julia Carlton's wonderful change from such a wild, volatile creature, to so benevolent a "sister of charity!"

Some—not very discerning people—thought her the embodiment of goodness; but others, who had looked deeper into the pages of human character, saw through her cloak of benevolence; and many who had looked behind the home curtain were well aware that oftentimes, when she was abroad on her errands of charity, her assistance was actually needed by her family—for her mother was subject to severe attacks of headache, and at those times the cares of the children and family devolved upon Mary. The sisters were so unlike in their temperaments and tastes, that but little real affection existed between them—though Mary oftentimes endeavored to influence her sister to become more gentle and mild in her manners. But Julia was wilful, and would not heed her sister's kind reproofs. For several weeks she continued to play her new part—visiting the sick and clothing the poor—until Dr. Vale began to become interested in her, knowing naught of her real character until a little circumstance revealed it in some measure to him, as every course of deception will eventually be exposed.

On the morning which introduced our heroine to the reader, the friends and neighbors of Mrs. Howland were called to see her spirit take its departure to the spirit land—as was supposed. Dr. Vale was present, also Julia Carlton. After a season of pain and suffering, she seemed to revive again; and Dr. Vale, thinking she might survive some hours longer, took his departure, saying he would call again in a few hours. As he was passing the open door of Mr. Carlton's house, he heard the sudden scream of a child and exclamations of terror and alarm.

Without waiting for an invitation, he stepped within the door, and a scene of terror met his gaze. Little Rose was standing in the centre of the room with her clothes in a light blaze, while Mary was endeavoring to wrap around her a rug which she had snatched from the hearth. But the child's frantic efforts and alarm seemed to thwart every effort to extinguish the flames. On a low couch lay Mrs. Carlton, who apparently had fainted, while Eddy, woke by the tumult and frightened, was adding his voice to the general confusion.

Dr. Vale immediately sprang to Mary's aid, and his strong arm soon extinguished the flames. It was then ascertained that she was severely burned; and while he applied some soothing remedies, Mary performed the double task of hushing Eddy's cries and restoring her mother to consciousness. When quiet was in some measure restored, Dr. Vale inquired how the accident had happened.

Mary replied that her mother being unable to lift her head from the pillow, in consequence of a severe headache, the care of the children and the household affairs had devolved upon her. She had rocked little Eddy to sleep, and laid him down beside her mother, who had fallen into an uneasy slumber, and leaving Rose busy with her playthings, had gone into the kitchen to prepare the dinner. She had been thus engaged but a short time, when a loud scream from Rose, followed by one from her mother, caused her to hasten into the room, where she found Rose with her clothes on fire and Mrs. Carlton vainly endeavoring to extinguish them, but faint and weak from pain and illness, and overcome by alarm, she fell back upon the couch and fainted. At this moment Dr. Vale appeared, and Mary again thanked him for his opportune kindness, in which her mother joined with earnestness.

Mary's sleeves were rolled above the elbow, displaying a round, white arm, and upon her dress and apron were many mealy marks; and her cheek crimsoned at the thought of the plight in which this gentlemanly young M. D. had found her. But his agreeable, winning manners soon dissipated her embarrassment. After quite a long chat, during which Rose had sunk into a refreshing slumber, the doctor arose, and apologizing with a smile for detaining Miss Carlton from her culinary matters, took his leave, promising to call in the evening and look at the child's burns. As he walked away, he wondered why Julia should be absent from home, when her assistance seemed so necessary; and Mary's sweet face and gentle, winning manners, were continually rising before him.

In the evening he called again, and Julia was present—her face beaming with smiles as he entered; and so great an impression did her tender caresses lavished upon little Rose, and her seeming attention to the wants of the family, make upon him, that he resolved to cultivate her acquaintance more intimately. Accordingly, the next day in passing, he thought he would call and inquire for Rose. Going in with the familiarity of a physician, not pausing to ring the bell, he accidentally overheard a colloquy between Julia and her mother, which amazed him and confirmed his previous fears.

"Julia, cannot you assist Mary this morning? She has the week's ironing to do, besides baking—and I do not feel strong enough to do much."

"O, dear, you are always calling upon me to do something about the house, when you know I detest housework!" was the reply, in a cross and petulant tone.

The doctor retreated and rang the bell, and upon entering, Miss Julia was all smiles and kindness; but her charms now appeared to him as the glittering colors that sparkle in the sunlight upon the scaly folds of the serpent. These two scenes showed him Julia's true character—for he was a young man of more than ordinary discernment—and also made known to him Mary's noble and endearing qualities, her feelings of true benevolence, which never seeks for praise as its reward!

The acquaintance of Mary and Dr. Vale ripened into intimacy, and finally she became his wife; and ever in the home of Harry and Mary Vale were found the elements of true piety and charity, which "vaunteth not," and many blessings and favors were bestowed upon needy ones, of which the world never knew. But the reward was within their own hearts—peace of mind and a consciousness of doing right! Reader! Go thou and do likewise!

REMARKABLE DREAM.

A late traveller in France says that there is an antiquated air about the celebrated Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris, that is very pleasing, and that very simplicity, amounting to a fault, has something touching in its quaintness. Many of the monuments behind the grand altar are of interest, and some of considerable beauty. There is one in the sacristy of particular interest; it was erected by the Duchesse d'Harcourt to commemorate the death of her husband and a remarkable dream that predicted the event. He was ambassador at the court of Vienna while she remained in Paris. She dreamed that she saw him lying sick and dying in his coffin, and that as she rushed forward to rescue him, he leaned forward to embrace her, and in this act expired. The letter acquainting her with his death informed her that it had occurred at the very hour in which she had beheld this vision. So extraordinary a circumstance was commemorated by her in a monument where the scene of the dream is represented.—Philadelphia Ledger.

NEVER DESPAIR.

BY HELEN.

Nil Desperandum! though trials and sorrow
May to our fortune have added their store;
The dark clouds to-day may disperse ere to-morrow,
And the sunlight of happiness shine evermore.

Nil desperandum! though all our friends leave us,
We to ourselves may still remain true;
For our Heavenly Father will never deceive us,
But add to our blessings each day something new.

Nil desperandum! O, be not sad hearted,
Each in this world has his trouble and care;
But let our aim be, when earth's scenes have departed,
That we reach yonder heaven—there's perfect rest there.

THE RANDIT CHIEF.

BY HARRIET A. DAVISON.

In the little town of Chieti, on the eastern coast of Italy, dwelt Carlos Bandettini and his wife and daughter Bianca. Bianca was a handsome, high-spirited girl, the favorite of all the village. Especially was she beloved by Antonio Brindisi and Stephano Foscari, the two handsomest youths in all the town. At the time my story opens, Bianca had declared her preference for Antonio, and they were publicly betrothed. Stephano was of a fierce, jealous disposition, and threatening vengeance, he suddenly left the village. All endeavors to discover his whereabouts proved of no avail; but that he had not gone far was evident from his occasionally appearing at his home, where his mother dwelt alone, with many comforts for her, for with all his faults, he had been a dutiful son. Bianca troubled herself very little about his place of retirement, and did not allow his threats to alarm her.

One day, sometime after the disappearance of Stephano, as Bianca was walking in the garden, she was startled by a rustling among the vines, and upon turning to the spot she saw Stephano standing before her. She saluted him very coldly and haughtily, and turned to enter the cottage, when Stephano sprang before her and prevented her from moving.

"Bianca, I have come to make you one more appeal, to give you one more chance to avert the misfortunes which shall surely overwhelm you, if you continue to resist all my entreaties."

"Go, you are tiresome," calmly and coldly spoke Bianca.

"Bianca, hear me! I love you far better than the coward to—"

"You only are the coward, trying to win a love with threats," angrily retorted Bianca.

"Beware! I tell you I love you, and you only spurn me. I have pleaded enough. Know then, proud girl, that I have joined the bandits, and your father's property shall be destroyed, himself taken captive, and only your consent to become my wife, shall free him from a lingering, painful death. What do you say now, Bianca?" he asked, mockingly.

"Nothing. I will never marry you; I will die sooner," and maintaining the same calm, cold exterior, though her heart throbbed wildly, Bianca brushed hastily past her tormentor, and entered the cottage, and upon reaching her chamber, she threw herself upon her knees before her crucifix, praying with white and trembling lips the Virgin Mary to save her family from the impending trouble. Rising, she by a violent effort controlled her feelings, and returned to the sitting-room where her mother sat spinning. All the rest of the day a shadow hung over Bianca; every noise made her start painfully, and when the hour for her father to return home came and past, and still he lingered, she snatched up her hat and set out to meet him across the fields. She had not gone far, when she met a body of peasants bearing a litter. Antonio Brindisi was in front, and immediately upon seeing Bianca, he sprang forward, and seizing her hand, endeavored tenderly to lead her back; but Bianca resisted steadily, and suddenly by a little impetuous motion, drew her hand from Antonio, and stepping to the side of the litter, she raised the cloth which covered the body and saw the features of her father. One dreadful shriek, and she sank senseless in her lover's arms. Slowly she recovered, and the peasants bore their sad load into the little cottage. Bianca's father had fallen from a high rock, struck upon his head, and died instantly, without a groan. So said the kind peasants; but upon going to her room Bianca saw a folded paper upon the window-sill, which she opened, and read as follows:

"A push for Bianca, I said, and the old man fell headlong over the rocks. Do you not falter now?"

A week later, and Bianca again felt the vengeance of her tormentor, for Antonio Brindisi her betrothed was missing, and no clue could be obtained as to his place of confinement, although every search was made. Another note lay upon the window-sill in Bianca's little room.

"Two gone, dear to Bianca's heart. Will she repent?"

This note was shown to all in the village, together with the other, but so close did the robbers keep themselves, that though search was continued night and day, no trace of their hiding-place could be discovered. Bianca for a time seemed prostrated by her trouble, but her youth and health enabled her to recover, and a few months after the death of her father, her mother and herself left the village and went to Rome, where through the influence of her friends, she was enabled to study, and become an actress, and in a short time a very successful one. At the end of four years, when she was about twenty-three, she was seized with a longing to return to her native village, and she did so. When Bianca arrived at Chieti, she found there had been established a small theatre, at which she agreed to act for a few nights. The villagers were in ecstasies. The day before her intended appearance, to her infinite horror, Stephano, grown older, and more wicked-looking, intruded himself upon her. Bianca was alone in the house, and, her heart sank within her when he began to plead his suit.

"You have come back to the village a lonely, sad woman, and may, perhaps, be willing to look with more favor upon the suit of one who has worn your image in his heart for long years. I am powerful and rich. What will be your answer now, when I again ask you to be mine?"

"My answer," said Bianca, slowly, "is that I despise you, and it is with greater loathing and hate than ever, that I look upon you. You are powerless now to do me any more harm."

"Fair lady," said Stephano, with a sneer, "I am not as powerless as you think for; I can again make your proud heart quiver, and perhaps falter. Listen: Antonio Brindisi is not dead as you have supposed him to be, but is imprisoned in a cave, which I alone can enter—and though kept from starving, he is ill-treated, and hard-worked. Say that you will be mine, and he shall be set free, given gold enough to last him his whole life."

"Villain! robber!" exclaimed Bianca. "Life and freedom to Antonio, purchased at such a price would be only curses, no boons. He can only die and I follow him. No, I will live to bring your head to its proper place, the block. Beware! for no matter how close you keep yourself, my eyes shall find out your hiding-place, and my voice seal your just doom."

With a low, mocking laugh, Stephano sprang from the room, and Bianca sank almost senseless upon the floor.

The eventful evening arrived, and the theatre was crowded to overflowing; many anxious to see their playmate and friend in her new life, and all eager to see the popular Bandettini. The play was far below any one of Bianca's accustomed pieces, being a simple comedy, suited to the capacity of the actors. The first scene was of scarcely any note, being merely an interview between Bianca and her lover. In scene second, the heroine is proceeding to the church to be married, accompanied by the girls of the village, as a train of honor, when they are surprised and seized by a band of robbers, the chief of whom is enamored of the young peasant girl. The curtain rose, and Bianca in bridal dress, followed by about a dozen young girls in holiday attire, entered at the back of the stage, singing the bridal chant. Suddenly a shriek is heard, and the bandits rush upon them. The bride rushes wildly across the stage, pale and shrieking—the bandit chief seizes her, and she swoons. The applause was tremendous, so well had Bianca acted her part, and many silly girls drew closer to each other and whispered—"only think, if it was true?" A moment, and the bride slowly opens her eyes, and partly raises herself, and the house comes down in another round of applause. Slowly raising herself, and looking wildly around, she makes a sudden bound forward, and reaches the foot-lights, where sinking on her knees, and stretching out her hands to the audience, she exclaims in low, thrilling tones:

"Dear friends, this is no acting, the bandits are upon us! Look around, they are in your very midst."

The people turn, and behold! every door and window is guarded by a couple of ferocious-looking fellows, armed to the teeth. Blank horror filled the minds of the simple villagers, who always held the robbers in abject fear, and now the horrible strangeness of their situation keeps them sitting motionless with pale lips and cheeks. As Bianca gave the people the dreadful information, Stephano, the leader of the band, came forward from the back of the stage, and seizing Bianca nimbly by the shoulder, dragged her upon her feet, exclaiming:

"By Jove! you shall go on! Myself and companions are interested in the play and wish to see the end. It is none of your business whether you play to real or actual robbers. Go on."

With a proud gesture, Bianca shook off the robber's hand and resumed her part, which was a pleading for the release of herself and companions. The spectators sat in dumb, helpless silence, watching with fascinated eyes the progress of the play, now rendered too real by the presence of the bandits. Clear, calm and thrilling, rose Bianca's voice as she pleaded earnestly to have her companions if not herself spared. Not the most eager, attentive listener could perceive the slightest faltering of voice or eye. While she was still pleading, the bridegroom and his train came to the rescue, and ranging themselves in order, presenting arms they fired, and twelve robbers fell dead. With an oath and shout of dismay, Stephano sprang forward, but quick as thought Bianca seized a carbine belonging to a dead robber, and retreating to the back of the stage, exclaimed:

"Blank cartridges for stage robbers, bullets for real ones. Advance one step, Stephano, and I will fire."

Then turning to the people, she called upon them to help seize the robber, and he was soon bound, for the people needed only some fearless voice to arouse them from their stupor, and make them act.

Stephano was tried and convicted, and his head chopped off; but not before he had disclosed the place of Antonio's confinement, and the place for the bandits' rendezvous, which was in a large cave but a short distance from the village, the existence of which was never suspected, and which was found filled with booty. Antonio was released, and with undiminished affection was received by Bianca, and but few days elapsed before their nuptials were celebrated with great rejoicing. The little village of Chieti still is in existence; though it has increased in size and population and changed many of its customs, still the name of Bianca Bandettini and the Bandit Chief, is unforgettably.

EXTRAORDINARY POWER.

A new and surprising phenomenon in magnetism has just appeared in Paris, baffling every attempt at explanation. A young man by name Alexis Baumann, is discovered to possess a power of fascination in the visual organ, so powerful that it attracts towards him every object on which he fixes his gaze. Every savant in Paris has been occupied with this wonderful peculiarity, and hundreds of experiments have been tried; but not once has the power of young Baumann been found at fault. The object upon which the experiment is tried being placed at a distance of about four feet, Baumann fixes his gaze steadfastly upon it, and presently the object, of whatever nature it may be, after quivering slightly for a minute or two, makes a sudden spring exactly towards his heart! This experiment has been tried many times a day for the last week, and has never failed. Several of the great magnetizing doctors have undertaken to prove the cause of this extraordinary gift, and we look forward to a bloodless battle between them and the Académie des Sciences upon the subject.—Yorkshire (England) Telegraph.

Many a true heart that would have come back like a dove to the ark, after its first transgression, has been frightened beyond recall by the angry look and menace, the taunt, the savage charity of the unforgiving spirit.

THOU ART FALSE.

BY EUNICE EDSON.

Go, go! thou art false, and no more thy name
Shall sully these lips of mine;
For broken now is love's flowery chain
That bound my heart to thine.

Go, go! I had dreamed thee pure and true
As aught of this earth could be;
I thought that thy heart no falsehood knew—
That thy vows were but pledged to me.

'Twas a blissful dream, but quickly past;
And I have awoke once more,
To find that my faith in man has gone—
That youth's sweet trust is o'er.

O, little dreamed I, when side by side
We roamed through the shaded glen,
That the time was near when this heart would scorn
The idol it worshipped then!

I see a stain on this sheet as I write;
It is caused by no tear of mine;
For know there is one too proud to weep
For a worthless heart like thine.

A MODERN HERO.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

TRENTE LEYCROFF, as he stood upon his vessel's quarter-deck, the clear breeze lifting the locks from his forehead, as a playful hand might fondle with the ringlets of a child, and his bright black eyes scanning the surrounding horizon, looked, standing there, "every inch a king!"—not of the pent-up and confined land, but of the merry, free and dashing ocean—of the sky-bounded, heaving mass of waters, rolling in all their grandeur at his feet—his kingly throne the white deck of his proud vessel, and his o'er-shadowing canopy the fleecy clouds floating above him in the blue summer sky.

Pleasant thoughts of home were passing through Trente Leycroff's mind, and home pictures and home anticipations were chasing one another through his brain, as he leaned over the vessel's side, a thousand miles away from the subject of his dreams. The last letter from his young wife told him news that sent a thrill through his heart, until now unknown before. He was a father! The handwriting was tremulous from recent illness, but the news it had to communicate had bestowed a strength that defied a longer delay. And in the lowermost corner of the sheet there was a shapeless, indistinct mark made with the pen's point. Guided by the mother's hand, this had been—the baby's mark! And as he gazed upon the faint evidence of the existence of his baby boy, Trente Leycroff let fall a gentle tear upon it—a tear that manhood could not blush to have recorded upon the tablet of his life's past actions.

Every dash of the waves against the side tells him that he is nearer still to home; every passing weed floating out upon the waves he watches, until it is lost to his view. There, from the recesses of his thoughts he has builded the form of the well-remembered homestead, and slowly it rises as from the waves and stands there before him, ready to be peopled from the same airy realms that called it into existence.

It is morning. They are all there—his gray-haired father and mother, the former seated before the open Bible reading aloud the accustomed lesson of the day, while his mother is reverently leaning her head upon her hand, on the opposite side of the table; his wife, quieting the child upon her knee, who is laughing gleefully at the bright morning sunshine beaming in through the window; and the two or three servants of the family listening quietly to the voice of the old man, as he asks a blessing on the labors and occupations of the coming day. He hears his own name mentioned in a supplication for his safety, and notes the tear that rolls down his wife's cheek, and drops upon the laughing brow of his infant boy as she listens.

It is night. They are seated around the pleasant fireside. The old man smokes his usual pipe before going to rest, and the partner of his life's pilgrimage sits silently knitting, and thinking of her boy far out upon the sea. The baby is lying in the cradle, and the voice of his wife softly humming over one of his own favorite ballads is heard, trying to lull the infant to its slumbers. The pictures of his fancy are right pleasant as he thus builds them from the store-houses of his wandering thoughts. A voice at his side scatters them forever to the air, and the cloud-built visions don again their fleecy wings and float away to their enchanted realms.

"Mr. Leycroff, there's a leak in the hold, and it's gaining on us so rapidly that I'm afraid we cannot stop it!"

He turned towards the carpenter, who had thus spoken to him in a quick, hoarse whisper, and there arose a sickness at his heart as the dreadful news reached his ear thus suddenly. But this was not a time for thought, but action; and so he instantly descended into the hold to see the extent of the damage. It was even so. The hold was then quarter full of water, and the leak was gaining rapidly, and so situated amongst the heaviest of the cargo, that approach was difficult, and the repairing of the damage next to an impossibility. A heavy gale, through which the ship had passed the day previous, was evidently the cause of the injury until within a short time previous totally undreamed of by all on board.

The pumps, then, were their only hope, and the order was instantly given that they might be manned and set to work, to try to keep her afloat. Stout hearts and ready hands were there, and soon every nerve was being strained in the efforts for safety. But the good ship was doomed, and slowly but surely she sank still deeper in the bosom of the vast encircling flood.

The water now rushed in in a perfect torrent, and as it gained each moment new impetus, the injury became still greater, and it tore its way through the stout barrier of wood and iron as though it had been but paper. Men ran about in haste, collecting such necessities as would be needed in the boats, which were being launched. In the storm of yesterday two of the boats had been lost, and grave doubts arose in Trente Leycroff's mind as to whether the remainder would suffice for their safety. As calm as though each instant were not bringing them closer to the grasp of destruction, he stood and issued his quick, stern orders. A hundred souls depended upon him now, and in the hour of trial they should not find they trusted in vain. The sharp report of the minute-gun echoed afar over the sea, and above the sound came the clear ringing voice of the young captain. The smoke obscured the sight, but his quick eye saw everything, and his thoughtful mind suggested everything of comfort that might alleviate the sufferings probably in store for those who soon would be tossed about upon the trackless waste of waters. And still amidst it all, the good ship slowly but surely sank still deeper in the bosom of the vast encircling flood.

The hardy sailors, taking a pattern from their calm commander, worked away in quick but silent obedience to his orders, and one by one the boats were filled and slowly left the side of the doomed vessel. The sky was cloudless, and the sun shone down in a flood of pleasant light; and from the steady and unruffled manner in which the orders were executed, one could not, but for a glance at their faces, guess that the sailors were occupied in other than their usual avocations. But there was written whole volumes of manly fortitude and courage, in the knit brows, set teeth, and bloodless hue of their countenances, and it was plainly to be seen that the race of heroes had not yet quite departed, nor was true courage laid forever to rest in the grave of the long-gone past.

O, God! the boats were now nearly full, and there yet remained some eight or ten human beings on board of the sinking ship! Some of them were women, and their shrieks deafened the sound of the booming gun, beside which the young captain himself stood, firing it as quickly as it could be loaded. The clanging of the ship's bell added to the horrid din of that agonizing moment, and the hand of mercy seemed withheld at the moment from the ill-fated beings upon the wreck. The sun still shone down, and saw the good ship as it slowly but surely sank deeper in the bosom of the vast encircling flood.

"There is but room for just one more!"

Trente Leycroff heard the voice from the boat, and as he wiped the cold sweat from his brow, looked for a moment round him. A young boy stood by his side and looked up into his face. Not a muscle of the boy's face quivered, as he pointed towards the boat, and said:

"Captain Leycroff, when you see my father, tell him that I died like a man, and that we shall meet again in another world!"

He knew the boy now; he had been sent out as a clerk in a foreign mercantile house, and was now on a visit to his only parent—his father. The father had not seen him for three long years, and he pictured with the quickness of lightning the fond and hopeful expectation of that man to embrace his boy again. To his own home his thoughts reverted, and the instinct of life was strong within him. His wife—father—mother—should he? No! They would not be altogether desolate; they would have each other still, while this boy's father would have lost his all! He seized him in his arms, and in an instant he was in a place of safety. The sacrifice was made—the rest was in the hands of God!

Again the loud boom of the minute-gun echoed far and wide over the deep—the shrieks and piercing cries of the surviving women mingled again with the sound, and again the hurried clanging of the bell filled his ears. Some of those who remained had sunk down senseless on the deck, and one or two had cast themselves headlong into the sea, and now floated away upon the frail support of a spar, trusting themselves to their fate. The rats sprang affrighted from their hiding-places down in the cabins and hold, and mingled with the human beings on the deck. The edge of the vessel almost touched the surface of the water, and the eyes of those in the boats were fixed in horror upon the doomed vessel as she slowly sank, before their eyes. They saw the heroic young man as he stood at his post loading and firing the gun, and prayers went up from their hearts that Heaven in its mercy might spare him yet.

The sun looked down to take one glance of farewell as the good ship heaved heavily, turned over to one side, and then—sank forever from its sight, down, deep down in the bosom of the vast encircling flood.

They pulled hastily away from that fearful sight, and the clouds of night soon settled over the scene of the drama they had witnessed. God's mercy on the souls of those who had perished thus fearfully in the bright light of day, and in the face of the smiling and unclouded heavens!

And now, a thousand miles away to the home of Trente Leycroff! The dreadful news has reached them, and that once so happy household is steeped in all the deep blackness of despair and agony. Some time has elapsed, and to outward appearing the usual routine of every-day duty has once more resumed its sway. But the sickening grief within the heart is seen, when, as of old, the gray-haired man sits with the holy book before him, and reads aloud the usual lesson of the day. Perchance he reads of the lost Absalom; and, as the agonizing cry of the bereaved father trembles upon his lips, his thoughts are with his own drowned boy, and the words are blurred before his eyes, while a choking in his throat stifles his further utterance. 'Tis soon when the aged mother, engaged in some household duty, meets with some simple article once owned by the lost one; and the fresh tears that arise, and the care with which the inanimate memento is laid away and treasured up, are the proofs that grief is not dead yet within the heart. And it is also seen, as Agnes Leycroff sits by the hour and gazes on her baby's face, to read there some traces of its dead parent, and clasps it closer still to her heart, as the image is prefigured before her in its eyes, and on its baby lips and brow.

The shadows of evening have descended upon the country, and as the night descends, the weather gives indications of becoming stormy and tempestuous. The wind rushes dismally through the old trees of the orchard, and the very foundations of the stout old homestead quiver and shake in the fierce blasts of the rising wind. The servants have gone to bed, and the family are seated in silence by the fire listening to the wild voice in the hurricane raging without. The child has been placed in its cradle by the hands of Agnes, but whether it is the noise without that prevents its sinking to slumber, or whether its mind is too intently fixed upon the philosophical nature and origin of a solar lamp on which its wakeful eyes have been for some time fixed, it remains obstinately wide awake. Mr. Leycroff broke the silence.

"A fearful night, this, for the poor souls tossed about on the raging sea!"

"My thoughts were wandering in the same sad direction, remarked his wife, stopping to take off her spectacles and wipe the moisture from them that had gathered there. She paused as she did so and inclined her ear to listen.

"What is it, my dear?" asked her husband.

"I fancied I heard the tread of a horse. It must have been my fancy, for no one would venture out on a night like this."

"The cracking of some bough in the wind, no doubt," said the old man; and they ceased to regard it.

The subject of disasters and dangers on the sea appeared to have some fascination to old Mr. Leycroff, for he returned to it.

"How many such nights as these our poor boy must have seen upon the bosom of the ocean! To think of a night like this, called suddenly from a peaceful slumber, and most likely dreams of those so loved at home—springing upon deck and finding the masts swaying to and fro like rushes in the summer breeze—the rain descending in floods upon the deck, and the vivid lightning flashing in the faces of the men as they lay out upon the yards, and struggle madly with the flapping canvass!"

The old lady shook her head and sighed, as she pictured the thoughts of her husband within her own mind. Again she turned her head towards the outside and listened, thinking that she heard the sharp bark of their watch-dog. It seemed to sink into a whine, and then was silent again. The old man went on, though Agnes could have wished he might have chosen some subject less painful to her mind.

"To hear the crashing thunder, as it descends from heaven's vault and echoes through the vast expanse of air, over the surface of the boiling waves! To listen to the groaning and straining of the timbers, as the vessel plunges heavily through the dashing billows! But"—the old man looked up as he spoke—"I forgot! I forgot! I was following the stream of my thoughts, forgetting, my poor child, that I was recalling painful images before you. Forgive me—I would not add one unnecessary pang to the grief you bear."

"How fanciful I am to-night!" said Mrs. Leycroff. "I keep listening and thinking I hear all sorts of sounds! I suppose it is nervousness. I was almost certain I heard a step outside in the hall. I must get rid of such fancies, or I shall lay awake all night!"

Was there a step in the hall? There could not have been. It was the quick closing to of some open door, caught by the wind as it rolled along the passages—nothing more! The baby lay in the cradle giving its undivided attention now to the ceiling, and watching with interest the play of the firelight upon it. No sleep about it as yet!

"Well," said Mr. Leycroff, "it must be getting late; we have been sitting here busy with our thoughts and have not noticed the passing of the time. I will just take a puff or two at my pipe and then will go to bed." He lit it as he spoke.

The wind howled without, and a fierce gust swept down the chimney, causing the dying wood-fire to blaze up all at once and afford new entertainment for the eyes of the child. It sounded outside in the hall, and seemed to rattle the handle of the door as it passed on its way.

Mr. Leycroff finished his pipe and laid it away upon the shelf, and then sat for a moment gazing into the fire. Another blast swept around the house, and Mrs. Leycroff shuddered as she murmured forth:

"Heaven be with those now tossed about upon the dreadful sea, and shield them from the fury of the raging tempest!"

"Amen!"

The handle of the door had softly turned, and the door opening, gave admittance to the form of a man encircled in a cloak. It was his voice that had spoken in solemn, deliberative tone, and as he placed his foot over the threshold and stood within the room, the same word dropped from his lips.

"Amen, mother! amen!"

A shriek that echoed through the room, through the passage, from the top to the bottom of the house, went up from the lips of Agnes Leycroff, as she made a tottering step forward and then fell senseless and motionless in the outstretched arms of Trente Leycroff!

He had been saved by clinging, as the ship went down, to a floating spar, had tossed about upon the waves for nearly two days, and had then been picked up by a passing vessel in an exhausted condition, and carried on to her destination. His iron constitution bore him through a severe illness in safety, and upon his convalescence, he was brought safely back home again. Despite the fierceness of the storm raging, he had mounted a horse, and as fast as the animal could dash over the road between the place of his disembarkation and his home, he had travelled in the face of the lightning, the fierce blasts and the dashing rain.

They did not go to bed that night until long after the day began to show its light, chasing away the clouds of the tempest that raged above the homestead on the night before. There was not a great deal said, but they sat in a loving circle, and gazed in one another's faces, while Trente ever and anon pressed his wife closer to his heart, and then stooped down and fondly kissed the child as it lay in its cradle at his feet. That youthful individual found his attention continually distracted from his contemplation of the firelight on the ceiling, and by daylight had not apparently arrived at any satisfactory conclusion as to the subject of his thoughts. What occupied his mind does not satisfactorily appear, as he preserved a complete and dignified silence upon the matter.

He did not know till long years after how near he had once been to fatherless; and the story was told him by the old man one night, as he sat and smoked his pipe by the side of the old familiar wood-fire. It still danced upon the ceiling, as it had been wont to do when he lay in the cradle, now standing in the corner, and fixed his baby thoughts upon its bright reflections, glowing merrily there above his head, when the shadows of night had fallen upon the earth, and the voices of the wind were heard without, sighing among the orchard trees.

SUICIDES IN FRANCE.

The suicides have been very numerous in Paris since the warm weather commenced. One old gentleman, who had heretofore made no less than six attempts upon his own life, at last succeeded in hanging himself one day, recently. His wife had for a year past employed a man servant, whose only business was to keep a constant watch upon her husband, and prevent him from making away with himself. But he got away from the servant, and did the job immediately. The wife comes into a handsome property, and we wonder that she should have so long troubled herself about this old fool, who wanted to leave her at ease. The disinterestedness of some women is astonishing. Not less than six people in Paris killed themselves on one day. Some hung themselves, some blew out their brains, one jumped off a monument, and one took a leap from a bridge. These cowardly fellows are better out of the world than in it. Apropos of suicides—an old oak tree in the Bois de Boulogne, long famous for the suicides which have been committed by persons hanging themselves to its stout old limbs, has just been cut down, in order to make way for some improvements. Lately, two young men, each about twenty-five years of age, hanged themselves to this tree. Their emulators must now hunt up another location for the transaction of this "stepping-out" business.—Daily Bee.

A wife full of truth, innocence and love is the prettiest flower a man can wear next to his heart.

LINES TO A BEAUTIFUL YOUNG LADY.

BY CLARA BEL ABBOTTON.

Thou of the peerless form and flashing eye,
With snowy neck and rounded limb;
Bright as yon stars that gird the azure sky,
When evening pours her vespere hymn.

Fair as the showers of clear white diamond dew
Night scatters from her radiant wing,
Floating like rosy light before my view;
Or like the first glad flower of spring.

Brightening my dull and weary pathway here,
Like some pure beam from upper heaven:
Darting its purple ray all calm and clear,
Just where the storm-cloud has been riven.

Lowly my spirit bends before the shrine
In which an angel is concealed—
But hark, for brightly all those beauties shine
By which the angel is revealed.

Lady, they say that thou art vain as fair—
I heed them not—I cannot heed;
Meekly I see thee bend thy head in prayer:
God bless thee, dear one, in thy need!

Beauty so rich and rare, thou radiant girl,
Will bring dark envy round thy gentle lot;
Fashion with fraudulent art and daisy whirl,
May make thee vain and false, if thou art not.

Darkness and tempest clouds enshroud the bright,
Their life is strown with many an evil snare:
Golden and gladsome beams are quenched in night:
Then, lady, bend thou low in humble prayer.

MY CITY FLIRTATION.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

THAT was a day in my life which I can never forget, if I live to a hundred years. It was the day on which I was sixteen years old. It seemed to me that the fullness of time had come. All past things were merged into that one dear, delightful era of girlhood. It was, indeed, the "age when time goes swiftly by, with diamonds in his glass." I had looked forward to this era during the whole previous year, and on the morning that completed the magic circle of sixteen years, I was a perfectly happy and contented being. My first ball! what an event was that! The first play I witnessed, which, by the way, was Douglas; my first visit to the great city, on my own responsibility, unaccompanied by friends to take care of me, all happened this year. The wings of freedom were very pleasant possessions, and the only wonder was, that I did not fly off with them altogether.

The secret lay here. I had a lover, to whom

I had been solemnly engaged from the hour in which I had attained the venerable age of fifteen. In my womanly appreciation of his wonderful dignity,—for he was nineteen years old, and a grave youth too,—I tried to sober down the flow of animal spirits which my happy childhood had indulged; and at sixteen I was really as mature as at twenty-five. Relying on my discretion, my father proposed that I should visit his brother, a wealthy merchant in Boston, who repeatedly solicited him to allow me to pass the winter at his house. My mother looked thoughtful, and he noticed it.

"I would not object to it, my dear," said he. "Mary must see life as it is, sometime, and perhaps now is the time."

"But will she come back to an ordinary home and simple pleasures, when she has passed a winter in excitement and gayety?" she asked; "will she come down to our humble sphere, after revelling in luxury for months? I fear, greatly, that we shall err, by placing her under such temptations. Mary is already fond of novelty, and she has taste, I know, to appreciate art. In your brother's family, she will have all this gratified. She is contented now, with the attentions of Albert Warner, because, as yet, she knows no one superior to him. How will it be when she has seen the elegant and distinguished men who are so often at your brother's table, and who, of course, must feel bound to bestow a little passing attention on his niece?"

"Now, Serena," said my father, "you do place the visit of a child to her uncle's house in a very important light. I do not see it thus, at all."

"True," she answered, "it is precisely because you are not a mother, that you do not see it."

I was an involuntary listener to these words; but they had an effect upon my mind that remained during the whole of that eventful visit.

I arrived at my uncle's house a few days before the New England Thanksgiving, when the season of amusement was beginning; and, thanks to my kind relations, I enjoyed the best of them. Everything which a kind and genuine politeness could suggest, was done to make my first season in town pass pleasantly.

My aunt was a fashionable woman, but she was judicious, kind, and sincere. She loved the splendors of life, but she did not sacrifice mind to them. She had a taste for the beautiful, and, somehow, she had the faculty of blending it with everything belonging to her. Even my sallow face and awkward figure received a new and startling alteration, under her direction.

As I gazed at myself in the ample glass in my dressing-room, three weeks after I arrived, I should hardly have recognized the elegant figure which it reflected, for that which had appeared a short time before at the Glenville ball. I was surprised at the effect which the dress-maker and hair-dresser had produced; and I confess that I secretly admired myself on that evening. I was dressed for a party, and I believed earnestly that I should make a sensation there. I forgot that there would be those present to whose perfect and complete beauty, as well as to their superior attractions of manner, mine would be as the moth to the butterfly. However, I enjoyed it, and was quite satisfied with the attentions which, as Mr. Goodwin's niece, I received. My uncle had no daughters, and, possibly, there were some young men there who would have little objections to me, if they thought I should ever inherit his property.

The thought of Albert Warner kept my heart from any entanglement; and I had not yet become surfeited with pleasure,—so that I cared little for the conquests of which others were so constantly boasting. It was enough for me to know that, wherever I appeared, I could command a certain degree of attention, and I asked no more. I did not stop to think whether the elegant beings around me had hearts or not.

This could not last long, however, and my serenity was disturbed at the first cloud. By my aunt's desire, I had written to Albert to come up for a week. He accepted her invitation, and I was glad and happy when he came. Happiness sparkled in his eyes, and made him look positively handsome. I went out to walk with him soon after tea, and my own happiness was complete. We returned home to find a party of our most fashionable friends, who had dropped in, one after another, to chat about the entertainment of the previous evening. And now came my trial. I had ever thought that Albert looked and appeared like a gentleman. I know now that he did; but at that time, I was jealously sensitive to anything which marked him as differing from the people around us; and my eyes watched every glance and movement in the room, when he was presented to the company by my uncle. I saw the sarcastic look of Russell Stedman, as he advanced to shake hands with Albert. I noticed the side-long glance which he gave to Louisa Graves, who, in turn, smiled back with an expression just like his own. My cheek burned with anger; and yet, I was worse than they, for I felt ashamed of his appearance, since it could excite their mirth.

Later in the evening, I was proud to find that, on several subjects that were started by my uncle, Albert conversed with a freedom and propriety far above any in the room, and with an evident understanding of all their bearings. But this exultation was sadly taken down, when Stedman asked him some questions relative to a subject of etiquette, and he failed to answer him satisfactorily.

Albert did not stay a week. He was evidently pained and annoyed by my devotion to fashion and style, and disturbed and angry with the impertinence of Russell Stedman, who, for the passing amusement of the hour, or perhaps purposely, to vex the "country youth," as he called Albert, had begun to load me with a series of unwelcome attentions. Albert saw all this with a jealous eye, and his sensitive nature could not patiently endure it. What wonder, when he saw that I was not satisfied with his personal appearance, and that I took every opportunity of praising the superior fashion of our other guests, their air, manner, dress, and all the thousand little nothings which attract empty minds. O, it was too true of me, what my mother had said, that this season in town would unfit me for my sphere.

I was becoming selfish, haughty, arrogant. I had unconsciously adopted the importance which, as Mr. Goodwin's niece, had been tendered to my acceptance; and, in my audacity, had forgotten that it was not mine, but only lent to me for the season.

My parting interview with Albert was very sad on his side—very cold on mine. I resented his wish to withdraw me from the scenes which he truly felt were unfitting me for the lowly station which, as a poor printer, was all that he could offer me, as his wife. He knew his own powers of mind, he acknowledged, and he was sure that some day he would attain distinction somewhere—but he expected to toil on for many years, and it would be easier climbing, he said, if he was sustained by a wife's hopeful love. Meantime, he was confident that I should never grow stronger or more hopeful in my love, by the life I was then leading, and it was his earnest hope and wish that I should leave it, and go home.

I was angry and surprised, and undoubtedly answered him peevishly. He turned away with a sad look, which haunted the whole of that sleepless night; but the next morning, Russell Stedman was by my side, and that day I spent whole hours with him at the Athenæum, hearing his implied admiration for myself, and his no less openly implied sneers at my "country lover."

I will not say that I experienced no remorse at this, for I truly did; and yet, such was the fascinating influence of his presence, that I went on, joining him in many of his opinions upon the quality of that sort of style which only could please those truly initiated into the mysteries of fashionable life. Weak as I was, I did not perceive how he led me on to utter such opinions, derogatory to the man who had showed how he loved me, by selecting me as his future wife. I did not perceive that I was unconsciously exalting this brainless puppy of fashionable pretensions above my own true-hearted and high-minded lover.

It was not until I sat down in my own room at night, that the voice of conscience was heard; and even then I resolutely turned away from its words. It told me to go home—to go home to the heart that loved me—and to leave forever the scenes and the beings that were coming between me and that faithful heart.

I turned away from the words; but as I caught a glance at myself in the glass, I saw that my cheeks and lips were as pale as ashes.

I rose the next morning with a strange, faint, wearied feeling; but I went out, and was soon joined by Russell Stedman, who rallied me on my pale looks. I strove to appear gay, and he promised to spend the evening at my uncle's house.

After I returned home, the old thoughts came back to me, but company, music, and lastly, the promised coming of Mr. Stedman, banished it from my mind.

Among my acquaintances, was a young girl who had deeply interested me from her evident sadness. She was frequently in company, by her parents' express command; but she always appeared sorrowful, and could hardly ever be prevailed on to enter into any amusement. I pitied her, and often left the dance and the song to sit beside her, for which, I must honestly confess, she did not appear so grateful as I thought she ought. I thought her very unthankful, for I had quite valued myself upon my magnanimity in leaving those who were congenial, and staying with this poor "wall-flower."

My aunt told me her history, one day. She said that she had been engaged, but that the gentleman had suddenly left her without the least explanation; and that she, for a long time, was very ill in consequence of his desertion. So foolish, my aunt said, to care for one who left her in that way; it provoked her to think a young lady would be so very romantic. It might do for the country or the seaside, but was quite out of place in the city! My aunt thought that the city was no place for hearts—and perhaps she was right.

Had my aunt told me the whole story—had she intimated that the man who had thus deserted Augusta Mayberry, was the man whom she permitted to come to her house—to ride and walk and dance with one of her family, I should have been a sadder, but perhaps a wiser woman for the revelation. But she never hinted that it was Russell Stedman who had cast this blight over the young girl's innocent life, and had condemned her to a long and perhaps hopeless struggle with her heart and her affections.

My answer was a light laugh, and an assurance that no man in the world could win a tear from me if he deserted me.

"Take care of your heart, then, with Russell Stedman," she laughingly responded.

Russell Stedman! Had it come to that then, that I was warned of him? Were our names linked together thus, and I the promised wife of another? I echoed her laugh, but there was something almost prophetic at my heart, and I longed to be away from her piercing eye.

I felt a light hand upon my arm. It was that of Warren Hay, a stripling of some seventeen years, who had attached himself to my side very often lately, much to the wrath of my constant attendant. He was entreating me to dance, and to drive away present thoughts. I went forward to the saloon where a few couples were forming a set. Something prompted me to shun Russell Stedman for the rest of the evening. He noticed it, and upbraided me with it as we passed each other in the dance, for he, too, joined the set after I had done so.

The next evening saw all our family at the theatre, myself included, and Russell Stedman was by my side. The same week we were at the opera; and so one evening after another I was led through the manifold dissipations of a winter in a city, until the spring dawned upon me, a worn and wearied being.

As my uncle's family was preparing to go to the country for the summer, I hastened my arrangements to go home, and the middle of May was fixed upon for my departure. My uncle was to accompany me, and I was strongly urged by my aunt to join her at Newport in August. "You will see Mr. Stedman there," she added. I bit my lip till it bled, for, although so devoted to me through the winter, he had not spoken in any way to make me suppose that he wished to be engaged. My own engagement to Albert Warner had long since become cancelled in my own mind; and, as I seldom heard from him, I presumed that it was also forgotten by him.

I returned home—O, so different from what I left it! The fallow skin was improved, the awkward figure was straightened, and made graceful; but I was ten years older for that one winter's experience; and, as I looked into the small glass that hung in my chamber, and which had never looked so small before, I shrank from myself. Ah, my mother's prophecy was fulfilled! All that evening, I was looking at the vacant corner which Albert Warner had always occupied. I missed the sight of his figure, the sound of his voice, the music of his cheerful laugh. And everything at home looked so mean and insignificant! My uncle's splendid house, gleaming with light, and the rich curtains and pictures, rose brighter to my memory, when I contrasted it with our small, narrow rooms. My mother's modest dress and smooth hair were so different from my aunt's rich velvets and satins, and her magnificent head-dress. Even the dear old piano sounded like a tinkling cymbal, after my winter's experience of the grand one in Louisburgh Square.

When the evening had nearly gone by, I ventured to mention Albert's name. I did it with a sort of foreboding; for something told me that he ought to be there to welcome me home. I had lost the excitement and interest of my city life, and I required another stimulus to supply its place.

My mother looked half-reproachful, half-complaining, when she informed me that he had given up his business some weeks before, and had gone either south or west, no one seemed to know exactly which. I said she looked half-reproachful. When I remembered her earnest appreciation of his talents and goodness—her wish that I should be his wife—and the disappointment of her hopes, I wondered that she did not feel wholly so.

"How blessings brighten as they take their flight!" Albert Warner never seemed so dear to my heart as on that evening, when I felt that he had forsaken me forever; for I did not doubt that my conduct towards him was the cause of his removal. Dissatisfied as I felt with my home, I felt that it would not have seemed so dreary had he but stayed. I thought of another—of the elegant and fastidious Russell Stedman coming to visit me in a home so different from the palace-home which he occupied in the city. I shrank from the thought. Whatever he had thought of me in my uncle's house, I was satisfied that here, he would not deign to think of me again.

So I resolutely rooted out all thoughts from my mind, that had the slightest connection with our winter's flirtation; for much as I already despised the word, I could not call it by any other name, since love was never named between us. And it was for a silly flirtation, then, that I had lost a noble heart.

Day after day, I communed with myself, and the summer was ripening without bringing me a single ray of comfort. What could I do? Even had I known where Albert had gone, I could hardly have made up my mind to write him; and I suffered in silence.

My mother's mind was evidently ill at ease about me. She missed the glad flow of my girlish laughter, which had rung through the house the year before. She missed the sound of music with which I had ever delighted her; for, little as I was skilled, I could always please her by singing the sweet old ballads she loved so well. I liked better now, to sit in my own room, with the blinds shut, and pore listlessly over a volume of poetry, marking such passages as agreed with the morbid state of my mind.

I roused up, one day, after many weeks of this listless inactivity, to the thought that August would be here to-morrow. And I had promised my aunt that I would meet her at Newport. The week before, she had sent me a letter containing ample means to prepare for the journey, and a promise to meet me at a certain point on her way thither. I did not know whether to go, or to send an excuse; but, as I finally decided that I was fairly rusting out in my present state, I availed myself of the outfit she had sent me, and in less than a week was on my way to the grand watering place.

We were late in the season, but my uncle's rooms were engaged months before, and we found them ample and commodious. The air and exercise operated beneficially on my spirits, and my fallow cheek assumed an unwonted glow.

We passed the entire month at this delightful place, and I think my spirits rose with every day's return. The secret charm was the presence of Russell Stedman, who came the very day after we arrived, and remained during our stay. The same attentions which he paid me in the winter, were now renewed; and it was with a feeling of pain that I saw the time approach which was to separate us. Albert Warner was again forgotten. I took myself to task for this miserable, vacillating spirit; but while he was near me, the spell was not to be broken. To disenchant myself I should have been obliged to go back to the old home again. His figure would not blend with the ordinary ones there. Do what I would, I failed in grouping him in that place, and with such a background.

Well, we flirted through the Newport season, and walked on the sands, and talked sentiment, the night before we left, but not a word of aught serious. So we parted;—I with a desperate determination never again to see him, and he, I suppose, with a resolution never to commit himself unless he was sure of my becoming Mr. Goodwin's heiress. I judged of this more truly on the following morning, when I was again an involuntary listener to what concerned me alone. I was in the front drawing-room with the blinds shut. It was so early that almost every one was in bed; but I had a book to finish, and I took possession of a chair that might well have been called "Sleepy Hollow," for it contained me entirely, feet and all, within its ample embrace. Leaning against that very window, stood two gentlemen, and I soon caught the following words:

"Well, Stedman, do you go with Mrs. and Miss Goodwin, to-day?"

"Me; what made you think that?"

"Merely because I thought both appeared to have arrived at a point when parting is out of the question, unless necessity compels."

"But I do not know as it would be politic in me to allow myself to come to that certain point."

"Why?"

"Because I do not yet know—let me speak it softly, lest lady ears should hear what lady tongue may proclaim—I am not yet assured that Mr. Goodwin will eventually adopt her, and without that assurance I can go no further."

"I understand. Have you any reason for thinking that he will not?"

"None in particular, but many in general. Mr. Goodwin is a public spirited man, and will probably leave a great deal of his money to public institutions. I like the girl well enough, but not quite well enough to marry her without money. I have not committed myself!"

I had heard enough—too much—and never foot trod faster than mine did back to my chamber. I met him at breakfast with a cool, easy, assumed sort of air, that I could see puzzled him terribly. He waited on us to the carriage, and asked me tenderly, when we should meet again. "I cannot tell," I said, "I have not committed myself!"

His cheek flushed crimson.

"Let me give you this piece of advice, Mr. Stedman," said I, "never lean against the outside of an open window, at a watering place, when you have secrets to tell;" and I stepped into the carriage, where my aunt had already settled herself.

"How tedious these lovers' partings are to bystanders," she said, laughingly.

"The next meeting between Russell Stedman and me will be more tedious still, to one of us, at least," I answered.

"What does that mean, Mary?"

"It means that Russell Stedman will never break my heart, as he has Augusta Mayberry's." She started.

"How did you learn that?" she asked.

"From one more candid than you were. From herself, last night."

"I did not mean that you should know that, Mary, though perhaps it was wrong in me to keep it from you."

I did not tell her what I thought, nor what I had heard that morning; and I went home feeling somewhat better than before, because I had been excited to anger, and it had taken away my sadness.

The next five years of my life did not pass away without clouds; and regret and remorse were sometimes terribly busy at my heart-strings. My mother was taken from us, and I alone was left to console my father. I was faithful to my duties there—hoping to palliate my past wrongs to another by patient discharge of the future.

My uncle and aunt were pressing in their invitations to me to renew my visit. I believe they were very sincerely attached to me, and liked to have me with them; nay, would gladly have adopted me, had I consented.

But there was a feeling on my part that preferred simple independence with my own father;—a feeling which probably I should not have known, had it not been for the heartlessness I had discovered.

Not until I was twenty-three years old, did I accede to their wishes, except for a day or two; and then only because my father was also included in the invitation to pass the winter with them. My uncle thought that the change would be beneficial to my father's health; and he promised him a great treat in the various lectures which were announced for the season, by rare and distinguished orators.

Seven years! Could it be seven years since I had arranged my hair at that mirror, for my first introduction into company? As I stood there now, calm, quiet—and I must say it—handsome, I could almost see the little sallow girl of sixteen, shy, awkward, and expectant, gliding in by the side of the full and well-developed figure which the woman of twenty-three presented there. I gloried in the change. I could not help it. I knew, too, what had made the change. It was the influence of high and lofty associations—the intellect which I had cultivated—the noble souls whose powers had been transmitted to me in the last three or four years, through their works which I had studied.

I had read deeply—earnestly—until the very souls of the writers seemed infused into my own. I had forgotten all that I had learned of the petty artifices of fashion, and had come out a true, earnest-hearted woman—a loving, trusting, hopeful woman—looking upon life as a means, not an end, and better, if not stronger for the painful discipline which I had known. I had worked this out for myself. I had not gone to this or that reforming or levelling power—the refuge of weak and disappointed minds; but I had truly to ascertain in what way I might discharge the duties belonging to me, and in their discharge I had grown into new harmony with nature and humanity.

I found a new set of people at my uncle's house. The butterflies of fashion who had fluttered there when I had passed my first season under his auspices, had flown away, somewhere; and Mr. Goodwin, growing old, and having no young people of his own, had naturally drawn around him those more congenial to his age and habits. It was very pleasant to me, for I dreaded going back into the old track. I had never felt myself fully entitled to enter the lists of fashion, even when I most eagerly mingled with her votaries. I did feel assured that I was able to appreciate talent and intellect; and I found now that I should be gratified to the extent of my wishes.

My uncle had become the patron of art. His taste had been ripened by two years' sojourn in Europe; and he drew around him all who were worthy to come into his sphere. Artists, scholars, poets, statesmen, gifted men and intellectual women, formed his daily circle; and it was with an expression of joyful surprise that he found that I, too, "if not the rose, had been near the rose." I had associated with gifted minds through their works—it was his delight to bring me with them face to face.

It was like a new existence to me. I breathed enchanted air. My father, too, renewed his old love for intellectual pursuits, and displayed so much intelligence and good sense that I felt proud of him, and so did my uncle.

We went, one evening, to hear a distinguished orator repeat a lecture which had attracted universal applause. I recollect it perfectly. It was "The Romance of the Sea." I had heard it the first time it was delivered, but I longed to hear it again; and it was with a sense of disappointment that, after waiting thirty minutes after the appointed hour, the president announced that the lecturer was taken suddenly ill, and could not appear. A murmur of disappointment ran through the hall, but the president proceeded to say that a gentleman from the west had been induced to supply Mr. C.'s place for that evening, and begged permission to introduce Mr. —. I lost the name in the sudden movement of the audience in settling itself again to the attitude of listening; but I saw a tall, manly, well-defined form approach the rostrum, and a noble head bowed gracefully to the audience.

Half an hour—an hour—even longer, the people sat, so still that not a word was lost, while that rich, musical voice poured forth its tide of eloquence, its stirring beauty, its melting pathos. Surely—surely—said I, to myself, I must have seen those eyes and heard that voice in my dreams. The sentiments were those I had often ascribed to some being who should come some day to the world with a new revelation of goodness and justice—to the ideal man who, strong in the nobleness of right, should be above the fear of all wrong; and, appealing to the noblest principles only, should carry all hearts with him in his progress. Vague, indeed, was my conception of this idea, but it was something. I thought, to have formed it at all, it was more and better to have it realized at all. Reflecting upon this, I had shaded my face with my hand, but at a movement that marked involuntary applause of a remarkable sentence which he had just uttered, I looked up and saw the eyes again. All the past years since I was a mere child, faded away in a moment, so much did those eyes resemble others that were treasured in my heart's dearest memories. For a moment, I was moved in spirit to utter an exclamation, but I suppressed it. The start which I could not suppress, attracted the notice of those around me, and I heard a voice—it was Russell Stedman's voice—ask if the lady was faint. I turned round to assure him that I was not. I wanted to look at him, and I knew that he would not recognize me, I had so changed, since he knew me. I saw a coarse, but still rather handsome man, who looked as if he was in the habit of "pouring deep libations," and I knew it was he, at once. His voice, peculiar always, had not changed at all. I should have known it any where, for its want of depth and intonation. The lady who hung upon his arm, and whose fan he was holding, showed that he had "committed himself," by asking her to become his wife. She was a faded, inanimate looking woman, quite a contrast to the burly and ruby-faced man beside her. I turned back gladly to the "eyes" again.

My uncle was in ecstasies; and the moment the lecture was concluded, he proposed inviting the speaker and the officers of the association to a social supper at his house, as was frequently his custom, when more than ordinarily interested in the lecturer.

As he passed from the platform, he was met by our party, and the president, readily divining my uncle's intention, seized the moment for an introduction. This time I heard the name, and it sent a thrill through my heart. I could not look up at those eyes now, for he had, I knew, recognized my uncle and my father, and soon he must know who "Miss Goodwin" was, too. I never knew how I got through with that introduction. I did not fully recover my senses, I believe, until we were seated, strangely enough, and by mere accident, side by side at the supper-table.

Then I ventured to look up, and the silent look I received was enough. The preparation of the last seven years had been made not in vain. He was changed, and I exulted in the thought that he was met alone in being so. Soul could meet with soul now; but how was it with the hearts? Had nothing dearer come to the gifted man—the idol of the intellectual—the impersonation of my ideal—since he had loved the little sallow-faced, ignorant girl? There were few words between us; but as we both leaned against a deeply curtained window in the drawing-room, half concealed by the ample drapery, from the eyes of the company, who were eagerly conversing upon some topic of the day, our eyes met. "Mary!" "Albert!" It was enough. Language, though it had been from the lips of angels, would not have helped us here.

* * * * *

"What are you writing so earnestly, Mary?" said my husband, just now, as he entered the room. "I should think you were preparing a memorial to Congress, by the way you put your soul into your pen."

"Perhaps I am—for Woman's Rights!"

"No need of that, dear; come with me, and I will show you the best exposition of that vexed question."

He led me to the next room, where three bright, laughing, rosy-cheeked children were trooping over sofas, chairs and tables, to the imminent risk of their own limbs and the spoiling of our new furniture. He joined in their play, with a face full of smiles, and beaming with a parent's love, while I stood by in affected dignity, pretending to despise such trifling in grown-up people.

"You can't help yourself, Mary, there is a fragment of a smile at the corner of your mouth, which tells a truer story than a thousand written pages could do."

He placed the youngest, little Mary, in my arms at that moment; and as I hushed the little wearied creature to sleep, I heard him utter softly, while gazing upon his household group, "I am content to die—but O, not now!"

SHE ALWAYS MADE HOME HAPPY.

A plain marble stone, in a church-yard, bears this brief inscription: "She always made home happy." This epitaph was penned by a bereaved husband, after sixty years of wedded life. He might have said of his departed wife, she was beautiful and accomplished, and an ornament to society, and yet not have said she made home happy. He might have added, she was a Christian, and not have been able to say, "She always made home happy." What a rare combination of virtues and graces this wife and mother must have possessed! How wisely she must have ordered her house! In what patience she must have possessed her soul! How self denying she must have been! How tender and loving! How thoughtful for the comfort of all about her! Her husband did not seek happiness in public places, because he found purer and sweeter enjoyment at home. Her children, when away, did not dread to return, for there was no place so dear to them as home. There was their mother thinking for them, and praying for them, and longing for their coming. When tempted, they thought of her. When in trouble, they remembered her kind voice and her ready sympathy. When sick, they must go home; they could not die away from their dear mother. This wife and mother was not exempt from the cares common to her place. She toiled; she suffered disappointments and bereavements; she was afflicted in her own person, but yet she was submissive and cheerful. The Lord's will concerning her was her will, and so she passed away, leaving this sweet remembrance behind her: "She always made home happy."—N. Y. Evangelist.

QUALITIES OF THE ROSE.

The damask rose, prepared in a liquor that is left after the distillation of rose water, is or was once made into a syrup which possessed purgative properties; it was recommended to be infused in whey of asses' milk, to be given in the morning, to purify the blood. The red rose, on the other hand, is astringent in its medical action; it is claimed to be good, when properly prepared, to heal ulcers of the lungs, and to check the spitting of blood. An old writer asserts that he has cured desperate consumptions of the lungs with cow's milk and conserve of roses continued a long time. There is also a consumptive apothecary on record who cured himself by eating sugar of roses almost continually.—Tribune.

A great many human beings dig their graves with their teeth.

THE CARRION CROW.

BY W. LEIGHTON, JR.

Morning awake! nature arise!
See brightly blush the eastern skies,
Prolonging there the foremost ray
That brought glad tidings of the day.

Soaring on high
Amid the sky,
I am the Carrion Crow.

Awake, ye forests, from your sleep!
Soon o'er the hills the sun will peep—
Gild your tall treetops with his light—
Drive from your depths the shades of night.

Proud lord am I
Of earth and sky,
I am the Carrion Crow.

Ye silent fields of ripening corn,
Rejoice ye, in the glowing morn!
Your golden fruit will soon be seen
Bursting forth from covering green;

A feast for me,
I know 'twill be—
I am the Carrion Crow.

The farmer looks upon his field,
Counting the bushels it will yield;
I'll dine each day his crops upon,
While his straw man stands looking on.

I'm a wise bird,
As he has heard—
I am the Carrion Crow.

When to the field my flock I've led,
Our watchman, upon the scarecrow's head,
Will see that none are lurking nigh,
Our dainty dinner to annoy.

For I was not Born to be shot—
I am the Carrion Crow.

I love to float along the sky,
Passing hill and woodland by;
Now bathing in the cloud's soft veil—
Now close to earth I gently sail.

Though sad my cry,
Yet glad am I—
I am the Carrion Crow.

 UNCLE STEPHEN
IN THE WESTERN WILDS.

BY ELLA CARLETON.

THERE are but few of us who do not think there are incidents of romance and beauty connected with the rudely-constructed log cabins of the western wilds; and yet one would scarcely have thought the rough structure of which I am about to speak ever held a being within its mud-chinked walls worthy the notice of the most humble pen. But I have said enough for a preface, and now for a few incidents.

It was long ago, reader. The steam engine had not then invaded the western forests, nor even sent its whistle and smoke in that direction. The topmost branches of the old oaks, with the first breezes of the morning, bowed and nodded to each other as of yore, while their progeny climbed slowly upward, and the young ivy kept them company. Here and there, in some cleared spot, where nature seemed at peace, and the birds were having one great holiday, blue smoke rose upward and wreathed off alone, for there was no other cabin's smoke within many miles to mingle and bear it company. Brown-armed children with ruddy faces skipped and danced beneath those trees, unmindful of the noisy city that was many miles away, where the poor are born and live and die without ever drinking in one breath of the pure air as it comes from nature's great reservoir. But to the minutiae of our tale.

The large, rough cabin of Samuel Champlin, or Uncle Sam, as he was called by the settlers who knew him, was piled together beneath the shade of one of those trees of which we have spoken, and around him were several rich acres of land that his own brawny arm, with the aid of his faithful wife, had cleared and got ready for the seed. There was no other cabin within several miles, but neither Uncle Sam nor his wife seemed to mind this; for, as they said, it gave them breathing-room, and space to hunt, and the children could whoop and exercise their lungs without the neighbors interfering in their sports or remarking upon their costumes. And so time flew by—the children growing larger and the precincts of the far-off city advancing nearer to the cabin. And then the more numerous settlers widened the Indian trail-path that led from the thick forests to the busy haunts of men, while yearly grew the intimacy between the settlers and the dwellers in the more thickly inhabited district. Winter came, and the glittering snow was piled and drifted in every direction, save the new-made road; but that was kept level, for the dwellers along its wayside now added to their gains in winter many a dollar that they would not have obtained had the roads been impassable; for gay parties of the youth and beauty of the town now congregated in rough jumpers and rude sleighs behind their hardy Shetland and Canadian ponies, and dashed off with almost lightning speed along the smooth surface of the snow towards the same smoke-browned cabins of the scattered settlers.

Among the favorite places of resort, was the home of Uncle Sam, for his cabin was of larger size than most of the others, and contained several different apartments, and the young men said he kept the best cider and apples, and the girls whispered to each other that his good-natured wife always made her cakes of better materials than the other log-cabin landladies, and then everything about the premises looked so neat and nice, and had such an air of civilization, that they were not afraid to partake of whatever was offered them there.

Early one morning in midwinter, I was seated at the side window of my room in the hotel, when I saw passing up the broad walk in the distance, the tall and well-proportioned figure of Edson Peirce. His step was hurried, and, to use a phrase of modern date, I knew something unusual was in the wind; so I laid by the paper I was glancing over, and stepped to the door to meet him.

"Good morning, Edson," said I.

"Yes," said he, "it is a good morning—just the one for a sleigh-ride, and we have made up a nice little party to go out to old Uncle Sam's."

"Who are going, Ed?" inquired I, with a good deal of interest.

"O, Charles Swift, Albert and William Hurd, Mr. Brenton and—"

"Brenton?" interrupted I, and I know I looked anything but amiable. "Why do you call him Mr., and all the rest of the young men of our acquaintance by their first names?"

"Well, I—I can't say, unless it is—"

"Because you are a little stupid, Ed."

"No, not that, Stephen, but because he is so much richer than the rest of us."

"And how do you know he is rich? for he has not been in the place more than three months, and methinks we ought not to pass judgment too quickly, when we have to take his word for everything."

"Why, haven't I seen him every day since he came among us? and I have never seen him yet without plenty of cash. And then, such letters of recommendation and introduction as he has; why, mercy! he must be from almost the highest circles of English society."

"May be," said I; "but—"

"Never mind about your buts," interrupted Edson, impatiently; "he is to be one of the company to-day, so do treat him as it becomes one gentleman to treat another, and he a stranger."

"Well, let it all pass, Ed. Who are to be the ladies of our party?"

"O, Lucy Atkins, Ellen Bush and"—looking archly at me,—"Angeline Knight, etc."

I felt a little too much blood escaping upward, but I paid him off by naming Elsey Davis, and then we began to converse about who kept the fastest horses that we could hire, and where we could get a jumper that would a little outdo the rest in point of beauty and convenience.

"Be sure and take your accordeon, Ed," said I, "and if you see Albert in season, tell him to tuck his violin in among the buffalo robes, for music is the life of the soul, and perhaps we can get that little wood-nymph of Uncle Sam's to sing to us if we play for her."

Edson promised yes; and then, after buttoning up close to his chin his shaggy overcoat, he again passed down the broad sidewalk, while I went in another direction to look for a fast pony.

Our company did not all assemble until about two or three in the afternoon, and then such a merry set as we were never made the woods ring so before. It seemed to be perfectly natural for every girl of the party to please. They all had such starry eyes, sunny hair and beautiful expressions generally, that it was difficult to say which one it was advisable to love the most. Brenton seemed to be the happiest of the party; but there was a recklessness about his manner that I didn't like. Angeline said with a silvery laugh, when no one was very near, that it was only because he had a handsomer pair of whiskers than I had, and because in our plays he was always adjudged to pay more forfeits. If she hadn't looked so roguish when she said it, I know I should have been vexed at that, but la! you couldn't get vexed with Angeline, let her say what she would, for she had such a coaxing way of saying she didn't mean any harm.

Early in the morning, as soon as the head ones in the company had made up their minds to go, they had sent a runner in advance to let Uncle Sam and his lady know that they might expect us in the evening; so when we arrived, which was soon after the sun bade Yankee land good-by for the night, such a fire as was glowing in that fifteen foot fireplace, I do believe it would have been considered a conflagration if it had occurred anywhere around here; but not so there, for it looked cheering out in that wild region, where one rough, stone chimney had to manufacture all the smoke that circulated for many miles. I was the first one to step within the wide door of the cabin, and with me Angeline Knight, and close behind us Elsey Davis and Brenton. O, what a burst of beauty met my gaze as I opened the door. There, in the corner, just where the blazing logs lit up every feature to the best advantage, stood Etta Champlin, Uncle Sam's eldest daughter. I had not seen her for a year, and she was now just sixteen. I had always thought her beautiful, but now, beautiful was a poor word to portray that child of the wilds. At a glance, I could perceive that she had visited the city since I saw her last; for she was dressed as tastefully as the girls of our party, though her costume was a mixture of the fashions of the Indian and white maidens; with bare arms and shoulders, and a short frock confined at the waist with a kid belt beautifully embroidered with beads. For a moment, I stopped and did not speak, for I was amazed at the change one year had made, but I instantly rallied, and feeling ashamed of my silence, advanced.

"Why, Etta," I said, "if you grow much more lovely we shan't let you remain out here in the woods—you must come to the city."

Etta glided easily and gracefully out of the corner, and, as she reached me her hand, she said pleasantly, but in a half whisper:

"The forest is the best place for the deer; it would die in the city—there is not room."

Just at that moment I caught a glance of Brenton's eyes as they were bent on the form and features of Etta, and I thought of every incarnate monster of which I had read from early childhood, but presently there came a counter thought—pshaw! it is only fancy; it is very ungentlemanly always to be imagining something against a stranger.

Then came in one after another of our party; and a little while was spent in laying aside hoods, caps, coats, cloaks, and then all took seats on the smooth benches drawn up before the fire. Etta seemed to glide around like a little fairy, handing a mug of cider to this one and a plate of cakes to that one, while her mother was busy in the square pantry preparing more and giving directions to two or three French girls who had been summoned from miles away, partly to help and partly to see and enjoy, as soon as Uncle Sam knew of our coming. All had spoken to the fair Etta. Brenton had been introduced to her, and everything promised fair for a very pleasant time.

"You haven't passed Mr. Brenton any apples, Etta," said Edson, as she reached the plate to him.

"O, I am sorry I slighted you, sir," she answered, innocently skipping towards him.

"O, never mind, my dear," answered the Englishman, looking full into her face; and then, as she came nearer and held the fruit, he said something to her that made the blood leap upward till it swelled the blue veins of her forehead, and for a moment left a peach-bloom hne over her face, neck and dimpled shoulders; but it was spoken so low that we could not catch a word, while she turned and looked towards the opposite corner of the room near where a candle (for it had become quite dark now) illuminated the features of a large, robust-looking young man who had just entered and placed a lantern on the table. He was dressed in deer-skin breeches and a short hunting-frock, with a strong leathern belt confining it at the waist, and a hunting cap, which, as I looked around, he was just in the act of placing on an antler nailed to the logs. He could not have heard what the Englishman said to Etta, but he heard his voice, and caught her expression as she looked up, and I never shall forget the flash that went out from his eyes; but he said nothing—he only bent forward as if to make sure which of our number had been last helped by her. A few moments after, Uncle Sam came in, and replenishing the fire, said:

"Now make merry, young folks; enjoy yourselves while you are young, especially in my house, for Kate and I were young once, and we always wished the old folks the longest lives that let us make the most noise; so laugh, sing, dance and play on those fiddle-de-dees to your hearts' content. You will keep nothing awake here except a wolf or two, and may be a brain that sometimes tries to make our acquaintance."

And then a little while after Uncle Sam and his wife disappeared, either by design or otherwise, and we heard of the former being engaged out at the frame barn seeing to the ponies, and that Katy had slipped on her cloak and hood and gone out to talk with him—to comment on the company, and tell him that as everything was ready in the pantry the young folks would enjoy themselves better to be alone. For a while we sat in front of the mammoth fire and joked and laughed, and then a few songs were sung. Etta took part with the rest, and then we requested her to sing alone. She complied rather bashfully, and sang a beautiful song that she had composed in leisure hours while looking on the wild scenery that surrounded them. How natural, how beautiful were the tones of her voice as they came up from the pure fountain of song. She did not seem to know how beautiful she was or how sweetly she sang, but she did seem to notice how closely the Englishman's eyes followed and watched her, and it appeared to annoy her; but she said nothing, and when the music commenced and all joined in the dancing, he offered her his hand in the set. She did not refuse, but looking towards the upper end of the room where stood the young hunter, who had been invited to dance, and was now standing opposite his partner, a young French girl, I saw that he gave her a peculiar look, that I interpreted as expressing a wish that she should accept, and in a moment more she was gliding with a natural grace down the centre of the long room in company with Brenton, her tiny feet scarcely touching the floor as they kept time with the music.

The Englishman appeared to be in his glory; he chatted and laughed with the fair young creature in the pauses of the figure, and when it was ended he took a seat by her side at the back of the room. Had his manner been that of a gentleman, nothing would have been thought of this familiarity by the dwellers in the forest, as their hearts were pure and they looked for nothing but purity in others, and they were so far away from the thicker haunts of men that with right good will they enjoyed the society of those from the settlements when they came among them; but there was a something about the manner of the young Englishman that the rural beauty could not fathom, and she would like to have shunned him, but the eyes of the hunter told her not to, so she did not rise as he sat by her side and talked.

"You are too pretty to be pent up in these woods," said he, with a great deal of assurance.

"I like the woods better than the town," returned Etta.

"But you would not if you could reside there a little while; it is just the place for such a beauty as you are to make your fortune. Why, if you were a sister of mine, I would have you in the market very quick, and marry you off to some of the nobility."

The young hunter was leaning against the rough mantel, and as Brenton went on, every moment getting more enthusiastic, and speaking louder to the fair one beside him, I saw his lip curl, and he gave a glance around upon the company assembled but made no remark. The Englishman's bold manner seemed to disconcert us all a little, but soon another "Take partners for a set" was spoken, and this time Etta danced with the hunter; and afterwards, when he led her to a seat, he bent his lips to her ear for a moment, when she looked up so full of confidence and love that not one of the company could fail to understand that he possessed her heart. This not only seemed to astonish Brenton but to annoy him; so when the hunter had left her side he crossed to where Etta was sitting and commenced talking to her again, nor did he try to disguise the contempt he felt for the rough-exterior lover. I exchanged glances with Edson, and I saw that he felt extremely pained, and a moment after he asked Brenton if he would not like to step out to our ponies and see if all were right.

"No," said the Englishman, with a proud toss of the head; "I prefer the society of the ladies, especially this little rustic beauty."

Up to this time the hunter had made no remark to Brenton, nor would any but a close observer have perceived that he noticed him more than any of the rest, but now approaching the Englishman, he said, pleasantly:

"Will not the other girls be jealous, if you show so much more attention to this one than to those that came with you?"

"And what is that to you? If they are jealous, would you like to stand champion?"

"Well, no," answered the other, in the same pleasant tone; "I shouldn't like to fight a human being if I could help it. I have no objection to encountering a bear or a catamount once in a while."

Edson and I exchanged glances again. I felt as if the current of my blood was beginning to congeal in my veins, and he looked as though if the girls were not present he would have said some hard things to the Englishman; for we knew the spirit and manner of backwoodsmen better than our imported companion, and we had seen enough of him to know that he would grow more insolent if the young hunter continued pleasant and conciliating.

"Well, then, you had better return to the corner, young man," said Brenton, "for it wont do for a rustic Yankee to be too familiar with gentlemen;" and then he drew himself nearer to the girl, and as if to crown the climax of his impudence, and to farther provoke the young hunter, whom he thought an ignorant coward, he said, "If you knew how to prize your beauty, you would not waste it on such a clown as he is,"—and he attempted to press his lips to her soft cheek.

With a light bound and a stifled cry, Etta sprang from him, while every one of the company seemed paralyzed, expecting that a death struggle would follow. As Etta sprang from Brenton's side the hunter received her in his arms, and still spoke pleasantly, saying:

"I would not harm you, sir, especially before all these girls, for probably they are not used to fighting; but I think it strange that you should be one of such an otherwise peaceable company."

I attempted to speak, but the sound only amounted to a whisper, while Brenton arose to his feet, seemingly forgetful that there was any one present save the hunter and himself.

"Curse you," said he, "for a coward! I make it a point to chastise any one that interferes with me, let him be where he will and no matter who is present," at the same time aiming at the other a blow with his clenched fist. The young backwoodsman's strong right hand met the arm of his opponent as it was descending, and for a moment it was held as if in an iron vice; then giving it a fling downward as a child would a toy, he said, calmly:

"Be quiet, boy, or your bones may bleach in the western wilds."

In an instant, Brenton drew a pistol from beneath his coat and aimed it at the head of the young man; but its contents remained in the barrel, for with an easy movement the other wrenched it from him and threw it into the cavern-like fire-place among the blazing logs. Immediately the Englishman drew a large bowie knife that he had kept concealed, and rushed toward the hunter with a face purple with rage. We all leaped to our feet, while Etta, with a cry of anguish, sprang into the arms of her lover, and at the same instant received the blow destined for the hunter. The assassin's knife stuck quivering in her fair dimpled shoulder. Her lover gave one look towards it, then turned his glance on Brenton. That look will go with me to the grave.

Gently withdrawing the knife and laying her softly in the arms of one who sprang to receive her, we heard a hissing sound escape through his teeth, and the next moment the same knife quivered in the heart of the Englishman, while an explosion from the burning weapon between the strong stone jambs told us that it contained a deadly charge. And now the wide rude door was flung back, and in rushed Uncle Sam and his wife to learn the cause of the explosion; but the scene that was spread out before them I shall never forget. On the spot where but a little while before we were all dancing so merrily, now lay Brenton, with eyeballs upturned, through which the light of day could enter no more, and around him in warm pools his own life blood. Etta now lay in her lover's arms, unconscious of the horror depicted on every face that surrounded her, or the wild cries of her mother who bent over her.

But we will not longer dwell on description, but say that the Englishman's bones bleached in the western wilds, and after many months of suffering Etta Champlin recovered from the fright and the wound inflicted by Brenton, and rewarded the brave hunter by a gift of her own fair self. Some may think that our party were to blame for not interfering sooner, but events followed each other in such rapid succession at the crisis, that we were bewildered until we saw the knife, and then it was too late for prevention. The law administered to the young backwoodsman no punishment for the deed, for there were too many witnesses in his favor. But this event did not disturb the current of our enjoyment long, for the next winter as gay parties as ever visited Uncle Sam's, but we were more particular who went with us. Brenton, we afterwards learned, was an extensive forger who had fled from justice, and this accounted for his having so many letters of recommendation.

"Emma," said Uncle Stephen, "on the very spot where that log cabin stood is now built a large frame house, surrounded by beautiful gardens, and the smoke from neighbors' chimneys wafts up on every side; come and look out of the window and I will show it to you."

I did as he requested, and he pointed to a beautiful dwelling but a few rods off as the one. As I looked and saw the dim outline of the woods away off in the distance, and the large mansion that intervened between, it all seemed to me like magic.

"Do you see that noble-looking old man coming up the street with a portly lady by his side, and those young children running to meet them?"

"Yes," I replied.

"Well, that is the hunter and his Etta, and those are their children's children; they all live together in that frame house."

A GREAT EEL FISHERY.

The eel is, in one respect, at least, a suggestive fish. "Slippery as an eel," is a phrase often used to denote character; and we doubt not that if everybody knew the extent of the eel fisheries of Italy, the term "plentiful as eels" would soon supplant the old Yankee expression "plenty as blackberries." In early spring the eels ascend the river Po, and in the months of October, November and December, when about returning, channels leading into still water-basins are opened, and the fish, thinking that they are upon their way to the sea, enter the basins in such great numbers that oftentimes the quantity accumulated there is so large as to form a mass which rises above the surface of the water. The eels are taken by the fishermen from these basins and conveyed to different markets. In the year 1851, about a million and a half pounds of eels, valued at $170,000, were captured in the basins in Cammachir alone.—Weekly Dispatch.

When we are conscious of the least comparative merit in ourselves, we should take as much care to conceal the value we set upon it, as if it were a real defect; to be elated or vain upon it, is showing your money before people in want.

THE ROSE.

BY S. H. S.

The rose is withering. Gentle flower—
How soon its beauty fades away!
It flourishes its little hour,
And then its beauty dies for aye!

I watched its lovely leaves unfold,
And richer grew they every hour.
But I remember I was told
The rose was but a fading flower.

So, like the rose our pleasures die;
They fade as quickly from our sight,
As clouds that veil a morning sky
Retire, and leave a clearer light.

SELF-DENIAL.

BY SUSAN H. BLAISDELL.

"COUSIN SOLON, are you ready?" called the voice of a young lady at my door, one morning, at nine. I recognized this voice as that of Arabella, the second daughter of my cousin, Mrs. Harrington, who had insisted when I called in on the previous afternoon that I should remain over night in order to attend a public breakfast with her and her daughters on the morning succeeding.

I was quite ready when Miss Arabella knocked at my door; and accordingly making myself visible, accompanied her down stairs. She was in the highest of juvenile spirits—that is, juvenility at seventeen—and talked to me with the greatest animation. I think she was conscious of looking especially pretty on that particular morning, and of appearing her best. Whether this circumstance had anything to do with her good humor, I cannot say; but I suspected that she was not without her share of female vanity. But she was very young, and really good-hearted. We entered the empty parlor.

"How, my dear," I said, "are you and I the only ones ready?"

"O, Cousin Solon, you know it takes Flora and Caroline a great while to dress," was Arabella's answer; "and mama, too,—she never comes down till they are ready. But I dare say they will join us in ten minutes or so; at least, by the time Harry comes in. He will be back here shortly; he only meant to be gone half an hour. Let us sit down in this pleasant window and talk together till they come."

I took my place beside her, while she chatted away in the happiest possible strain. I am one of the class denominated "good listeners;" a character which suited my little cousin admirably that morning; for she was eager to tell me of the gayeties into which she had lately entered, having but just "come out:" of her beautiful new set of pearls, which she had teased mama to purchase for her; and of a love of a bouquet which had the evening before been presented her by a certain distinguished gentleman, whose notice made her an object of especial envy to a great number of young ladies.

All this I heard very distinctly; but I was thinking at intervals of something quite unconnected with the subject of Miss Arabella's elegancies; and as soon as courtesy would permit, after its conclusion, or what, from the length of the succeeding pause, I inferred to be such, I asked:

"At what time, my dear, does your cousin Elma come?"

"At a quarter past nine she said she would be in." And she consulted her watch. "It is five minutes past now, Cousin Solon; so she will be here in exactly ten minutes more. Not a second earlier or later, I assure you; for Elma Beverly is a jewel of punctuality."

Mrs. Harrington entered with her youngest daughter, Caroline, at this moment.

"Elma Beverly—what about her? Ah, Solon—ready? Well, is not Elma here?"

"No, mama. You know she is not to be here till a quarter past nine," said Arabella.

"Isn't Harry come back yet from the office?" asked Caroline, the languid and ringleted Caroline, the sentimental one of the family, who at sixteen imagined herself a heroine of romance, and affected airs accordingly.

She drew a small volume from her pocket, as she received a negative answer, and proceeding to ensconce herself in the recess of a neighboring window, awaited the moment of departure, wrapt in the sorrows and calamities of some imaginary beauty—the counterpart of herself.

Caroline wore a white muslin gown—"a robe of snowy fabric," perhaps I ought to say with (according to the approved style of damsels in novels) "no ornament save a single rose, twined in her luxuriant tresses." She was not by any means pale, as she would have liked to be; on the contrary, she had the finest color of any one in the family. Still, by the aid of her long, dark curls, she managed to make herself look tolerably romantic. But I digress.

Mrs. Harrington seated herself in a comfortable rocking-chair near me, casting critical and complacent glances, first upon Arabella, then upon Caroline.

"Really, you look very well, girls, this morning," she said, approvingly; and the satisfied expression of her eyes, as they met mine, said : "There are no girls like my girls." It was a mother's vanity—pardonable, perhaps.

Flora entered now ; Flora—stately, elegant, graceful,—her mother's especial pride. Mrs. Harrington was very proud of all her children—Flora, Arabella, Caroline, and Harry (who, by the way, was really a fine boy, and my favorite); but Flora was her favorite, I think. The young lady glided into the room with her usual graceful and somewhat haughty air, and speaking to one and another with a mingling of courtesy, affability and nonchalance in her manner, advanced to a window, with the current inquiry for Harry. Mrs. Harrington glanced at me again, with ill-concealed triumph in her eyes. If her other girls looked well, Flora outshone them.

And, truly, they were all handsome girls, and were dressed with indisputable perfection of taste. My cousin Sophia took care of that. She was one to pride herself on matters of dress. Expense, too, was one of the last things considered. Not a flaw was to be discovered in any part of the attire of herself or her children. Nothing was worn but that which was new, elegant and perfect in every respect. The maids my cousin employed had nothing to complain of in regard to the generosity of their mistress. The supplies of dresses and bonnets from their mistress, who seldom wore either a dress or a bonnet a dozen times, was incredible. But it showed people how well and how expensively my cousin Harrington and her children were in the habit of dressing.

We waited a few moments, conversing together, and exactly at a quarter past nine my niece Elma arrived, accompanied by Harry, who had joined her on the way. They came in together, he a bright, handsome, gallant boy of eighteen, laughing-eyed and rosy-cheeked, and she a pretty, simple, innocent girl of the same age, who looked, in her pure, light muslin, and her little white bonnet, with its wreath of lilies of the valleys, as fresh and charming as a spring flower.

"Good morning, Cousin Elma!" "Good morning, Cousin Elma!" they all said, and all shook hands with her—the girls, I know, thinking how pretty she looked, and Mrs. Harrington herself surveying her with a critical eye as she kissed her, and then told her how well she was appearing this morning. That included dress and all, I could see. Sophia was very well satisfied with the appearance of her young cousin. Indeed, I do not see how it could be otherwise. The child always seemed to me without a fault. But if she had been dressed in serge, I do not think I should have thought her as pretty, when her sweet young face lighted up with such a beautiful smile, and she said in such a musical voice, as she kissed me, "Good morning, Uncle Solon ; I am very glad you are going with us."

"I thank you, my dear. How does your mother do to-day?" I said.

"My mother is very well, I thank you. She sends her love to you, uncle ; and to you all," turning again to Mrs. Harrington and the girls, "and bade me say again that she very much regretted not being at liberty to accompany you ; she could not break her previous engagement with Mrs. Morrison."

"Yes, I am quite sorry," answered Mrs. Harrington ; "for I really depended, until yesterday, upon her going. It is so vexatious, Solon," she continued, turning to me, "that Emily will spend the day with a deaf old woman, and find pleasure in it, when she might be going with me."

She stood there, drawing on her gloves, when a carriage drew up before the door, and the girls' delighted exclamation, "O, there's Mrs. Mostyn and her nephew!" was immediately followed by the entrance of a pleasant, majestic-looking, middle-aged lady, attended by a gentleman some years younger—probably he was twenty-five, or thereabouts, though a certain dignity and seriousness blending with the gentle expression of his fine features, made him appear somewhat older than he was,—and this was her nephew and my young friend, Mr. Mostyn.

The exchange of salutations concluded, Mrs. Mostyn said at once to my cousin Sophia :

"My dear, I have come to take one of your girls up on my way to the rooms. I hope you'll consent?"

"With pleasure," smiled Mrs. Harrison.

"Very well ; I should like Flora. Flora, my dear, will you come?—O, and you, too, Miss Elma. May I ask so much?—that is, if I don't break up your party too much?" And she then turned to Mrs. Harrington.

Elma had glanced hesitatingly towards Mrs. Harrington, who said :

"O, certainly, if you wish, Mrs. Mostyn ;" for she had a kind of reverential admiration for this lady, whose birth, wealth and talents settled her position among the highest ; and whatever she said or did was law.

A moment before we all set out, Mrs. Harrington stood in the hall with Elma. I saw her examining something which she held in her hand. Her countenance had lost a degree of its usual placidity, and Elma was slightly coloring.

"What is the matter, my dear?" asked Mrs.

Mostyn, quietly, taking her nephew's arm and joining them.

Cousin Sophia looked up. "O, nothing of great consequence," she answered, and yet with a slight air of annoyance and severity; "only Elma's glove—she has had the carelessness to put on a pair which are really not fit to be seen."

"Indeed! Why, I was thinking very differently a moment ago," returned Mrs. Mostyn. "Let me see, my dear—not fit to be seen! Where?"

"One is mended," said Elma, in a low voice, and with a timid blush.

"Mended?—why, really, so it is—and very nicely, too. One cannot see it without close examination. If that is all the fault, pray let the child wear the gloves." And she turned, smiling, to my cousin Harrington. "If any one should chance to discover the fact of their having been mended, it will only be to give credit to her skill as a most expert needlewoman."

"Rest assured, madam," said the nephew, in a subdued tone to Mrs. Harrington, "that no one who observes Miss Beverly's hand will ever remark an imperfection in her glove."

My cousin Harrington smiled faintly, and said no more; but I could see that her annoyance was not quite dissipated. With a grave look, she returned to Elma her handkerchief, which she had also been examining, I was sufficiently curious to examine it myself, a moment after, and found a single spot in it, close to the embroidery, where the fabric having worn thin, had been darned with the greatest nicety. But imperceptible as it might have been to others, this single spot had not escaped the eyes of the pink of particularity, my cousin Harrington; and she was therefore excessively annoyed; for she had always interested herself in Elma, as much as her own daughters, in the matter of dress.

"So she scolded you about the gloves and the handkerchief, did she, Elma?" I said, laughingly aside, to the young girl.

Elma blushed.

"Yes, Uncle Solon. But it was my fault. I should have remembered how particular she is. These, however, are my best gloves. And, indeed, I thought they would do sometime yet to wear. I would have brought another handkerchief, if I had thought; but the gloves I could not help wearing, since I had none better. I wished to make them last a week or two longer."

"Economical little Elma! That is right, dear child. But do you know, Elma, I have a curiosity to know why you are so economical? You do not need to wear imperfect gloves or handkerchiefs either. Your quarterly allowance was, I know, paid you only the week before last. To be sure, it is not a great sum, but then it would buy you numbers of pocket-handkerchiefs and gloves. And that is, I believe, what it is partly given you for."

Elma blushed again.

"I know—but I want the money for something else, Uncle Solon."

"You do? What, I wonder—eh, little Elma? Well, well—I won't tease you, dear," for she was looking, I fancied, a little embarrassed.

At that moment, all were ready to go, and as Mr. Mostyn came for Elma, our conversation was broken off. I entered the carriage with my cousin Harrington and her two younger daughters.

"Pray, Cousin Solon," said Arabella, "what was that you and Elma were saying about economy, in such an earnest way? Something, I dare say, about her gloves, wasn't it?"

"Yes, my dear," I answered.

"Well, whatever it was, Mr. Mostyn must have heard every word, for he was close by you with his mother, though neither of you seemed to observe them; and if there was anything said confidentially, why, he must know it."

"Really, my dear, I do not recollect that we said anything which we would have wished to conceal from him or you either," I said.

I speculated during the remainder of the drive, upon the subject of Elma's gloves, and Elma's economy. My cousin Harrington was once more in her usual good humor. She had evidently dismissed the matter from her mind.

We arrived at our place of destination, and were rejoined by Mrs. Mostyn and her nephew, with Flora and Elma, who, for her part, looked the picture of happiness.

"What a beautiful woman Mrs. Mostyn is, Uncle Solon!" she said, aside, to me. "I do not think I ever liked her so well before."

I thought it might be because the attraction was mutual; for Mrs. Mostyn, I know, had been led that morning to look deep into Elma's nature, and such a nature could not but be otherwise than pleasing to her, if she read it correctly, which I felt that a woman of her penetration could not fail to do.

"So you had a pleasant drive, Elma?" I asked.

"Very pleasant—yes, Uncle Solon. Indeed, how could it be otherwise? I do not think I ever met with more agreeable persons than Mrs. Mostyn and her nephew. They both converse charmingly—do they not? Better, I think, than any one I ever heard, almost."

"They understand what the word 'conversation' means, Elma, that is it; and both have minds most excellently and abundantly stored with knowledge. You will gain a great deal of benefit from their society. But we must look about us now and how to people. All the world is here this morning, I believe."

With the occupation of bowing to people, and our coffee-cups, while we all—that is, Mrs. Mostyn's party and ours—kept up a lively conversation, we got through half an hour, at the expiration of which time, we repaired to the gardens opening from the rooms, whither a great portion of the company had already proceeded.

We had been there but a little while, when a group of ladies of my cousin Harrington's acquaintance came towards us, and accosted her. One of them held in her hand what seemed to be a subscription paper, got up for the benefit of some popular object or other, which just then attracted a great deal of attention. Mrs. Harrington and her three daughters immediately appended their names, with each a considerable sum. I contributed my part also. Elma, however, when asked to sign, reflected a moment, and then, with a slight deepening of color, declined doing so.

"Why Elma! Why not?" was the simultaneous exclamation of her cousins.

"Elma," said Mrs. Harrington, coldly, "I thought you expressed your approval of this object, yesterday?"

Elma colored more deeply. Every eye—Mrs. Mostyn's, Charles Mostyn's and all—was directed to her.

"I did, Cousin Sophia," she said, in a low voice, "but I cannot subscribe. I am very sorry."

"As you please," said Mrs. Harrington, turning away, while Flora and Arabella slightly smiled, and the latter said in a light way:

"Another instance of cousin Elma's 'economy,' I suppose, isn't it? Be careful, Elma, or instead of an economist, I shall think you are a little miser."

"I should not refuse to subscribe, Arabella, if I had not good reasons for it," said Elma, gravely.

"I am sure, Elma," returned her cousin, "you had your allowance when I had mine, and I know you have not spent a single penny."

"No, I have not spent any of it, Arabella."

"How then, do you say you cannot subscribe?"

Elma was silent an instant. Then she said, gently: "Because it is true, Arabella."

Arabella turned away, silenced by the gentle rebuke. Mrs. Mostyn quietly pressed Elma's hand, with an affectionate smile.

"I am sure," she said, kindly, "Elma would gladly give her money if she could do so conscientiously."

A grateful glance beamed from the young girl's eyes; and the approving look she met seemed to give her new courage.

"An enigma, certainly," said a subdued voice at my side. I turned, to see Mr. Mostyn's thoughtful eyes fixed reflectively on my niece's countenance.

"Who—Elma!" I said. "Do you think her an enigma?"

"Yes, and one of no inconsiderable interest, at least, to me. I am trying (it may be impertinent, but I cannot help it,) to study her motives. Not alone those of the present moment, but of her whole life."

"The study is worth your attention, my boy." "I believe it."

That was all we said. A little while longer and we left the place.

My cousin Harrington had now to visit a neighboring bookseller's with me; and as Mrs. Mostyn wished to go there also, it was settled that we should go together. Arabella and Caroline, who had no desire to accompany us, returned home in my cousin's carriage, and the remainder continued the way in that of Mrs. Mostyn.

We arrived at the bookseller's in a few minutes, and there a new trial awaited Elma. My cousin Harrington and Mrs. Mostyn selected the books they wished for, and then we all lingered, examining some new works just got out. Suddenly Flora called to Elma.

"See, cousin," she said, "here I have fortunately come across the very books you were wishing to get, the other day. The — Magazines, in two large volumes, and nicely bound, too. See, Elma, what a prize!"

Elma's eyes sparkled, and her cheeks grew red—a vivid, brilliant red, as she sprang to Flora's side. O, let me see them, Flora!" she said, eagerly, and stretched out her hand. Then as suddenly she drew it back, with the beautiful flush of girlish delight fading quietly out from her cheek, and her countenance growing slightly serious, as a look of remembrance passed over it; the remembrance of an obstacle. I noticed this, and Mostyn noticed it, too, though Flora did not; for she had immediately turned to the bookseller, inquiring if the books were for sale, or already engaged. He answered that they were for sale, and named the price.

"There, you see the books are yours, Cousin Elma," laughingly said Flora, turning to her again. "Take them now. Will you do them up for Miss Beverly, if you please?" to the shopman.

"No, no; I have changed my mind, Flora," said Elma, quietly. "I do not want—that is—I will not take the books at present."

"Will not take them, Elma! surely you cannot be in earnest!" uttered Flora, in a tone of astonishment. "These books, of which you have talked so much for the last six months! What are you thinking of?"

"I cannot take them, Flora," urged Elma, in a subdued voice. "I beg you not to say anything more about it."

"You had better allow me to put them up, if I may be so bold, miss," said the bookseller, politely, "for I do not think I could get another set at any price whatever, and if you really want them, I should be sorry to let them go to any one else. Shall I put them down to Mrs. Beverly's account, miss?"

"Yes, you had better take them; let him pack them, Elma," urged Flora. "Your first and last chance, remember; and I know how sorry you will be that you did not take them, if you let them go now."

The flush on Elma's cheek was one of pain and of confusion at the consciousness of so many eyes attracted towards her by this scene. Poor Elma had not learned yet how to bear herself with composure, under the charge of singularity. She looked troubled, agitated.

"Dear Flora," she said, in a low, imploring, hurried voice, with downcast eyes, half turning away, as if to escape the curious eyes around her, "indeed, indeed I do not want those books now, and I cannot have them put down in mama's name. I never did such a thing in my life. No, I really, really do not want them at all. Pray tell him so, and do not say anything more about it."

Flora looked at her a moment with a surprised and offended air.

"Really, my dear, you are incomprehensible this morning," she said, at length, in a suppressed and freezing whisper. "You need not trouble yourself to pack them," she continued, coldly, addressing the bookseller; "Miss Beverly does not wish for them. Mama," to Mrs. Harrington, "are you ready to go?"

Mrs. Harrington had stood all this time, observing the scene before her, with visible and increasing annoyance. I knew that any scene of this kind, calculated to draw attention and curiosity, was inexpressibly displeasing to her. Her countenance displayed it, as she turned to her friend.

"Mrs. Mostyn, shall we go now?" she said, briefly.

I could not tell why Elma had refused the books which, for many a long month, she had been wishing to obtain, and which was rarely to be found then, the publication having existed and ceased some twelve years before; but I knew she wanted them. Hastening across the shop, I joined Mostyn, who was standing by the counter, speaking with the bookseller.

"Sir," I said to the latter, "I wish to purchase those books; will you do them up, if you please, and send them this evening to—"

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I have just disposed of them," was the low-toned reply.

The surprise his words occasioned was instantly abated, as I looked at Mostyn, and met his warning glance, beseeching secrecy. He was the purchaser. He had anticipated me by exactly half a minute. And with this little by-play, unobserved by any but Mrs. Mostyn, we followed the party from the shop.

I know my cousin Harrington was more deeply incensed during that day, than I had ever seen her before. I do not know whether she reprimanded Elma, as I am certain she felt inclined to do, for what she was pleased to term "her very singular conduct;" but she talked to me about it, with considerable excitement.

"I truly believe," she said, "that people will say that Emily has lost every penny of her fortune; for certainly, Elma's behaviour to-day would lead one to suppose them absolutely beggared. What strange freak can have got into her head now? Her singularity is certainly insufferable. She made me absolutely ashamed of her to-day."

And Sophia was seriously indignant. She called on Emily the next morning. I was not present, but I heard afterwards that she spoke very emphatically of Elma's "singularity," and very seriously inquired whether Emily had not really become suddenly reduced in circumstances. Now Emily knew that Sophia was truly a good-hearted person in the main, although so trammelled by her regard for appearances, and so blunt spoken as she was: accordingly, she chose to laugh, rather than become offended; made our cousin Harrington take off her bonnet, and stay to dinner; assured her that she, herself, had not lost her fortune, and that the cause of Elma's seeming parsimony was really a very good cause indeed, and one which she would perhaps approve some day.

Emily, on learning the story of the books, without the conclusion, touching their final purchase, was delighted with her daughter's power of self-denial.

"I know it must have cost you a great deal to give them up, my dear," she said to her, "even for so good a purpose as you have in view; and now you shall have them indeed."

She immediately summoned a domestic, and despatched him to the bookseller's, to secure the books. Of course, they could not be obtained, having, as the man brought back word, been already disposed of.

Now that she had imagined them almost certainly in her possession, this sudden disappointment, after all, was very hard indeed for poor Elma to bear. But she put it down with a firm hand, after the first, and turned away from the contemplation of it.

"It is not such a terrible disappointment, Uncle Solon," she said, cheerfully.

I was bound in honor not to betray Mostyn, or I believe I must have acquainted her with the destination of her beloved and long-coveted books.

"Do you not wish now that you had taken them, Elma?" I asked.

She reflected a moment, and then shook her head.

"No, Uncle Solon, I do not. I should be very unhappy now, if I had yielded and taken them. I am glad I did not." And I knew she really was.

The autumn which witnessed the scenes I have described, deepened gradually into winter. Now, I saw Elma in a warm, brown cloak, and close winter bonnet, taking her brisk walk every day, where I had seen her so lately in her warm-weather muslins and simple cottage straw. I could not tell whether she looked prettiest then or now. But I knew—blessings on that dear, sunny little face!—that she was my own, pretty, favorite, loving Elma, at all times the same, summer or winter.

I met her at my cousin Harrington's, sometimes; sometimes at Mrs. Mostyn's; often and often in her own home, where I spent many a happy hour, and where I was always received with a warmth and cordiality that was dearer to me than I found it elsewhere.

But wherever she was, Elma was always bright, cheerful and busy as a bee. I do not remember ever seeing her, when she was not intent upon some good and useful work, for the good of somebody or other. She had always been thus, from her childhood; her life and its aims the very opposite of those of her cousins, the Harringtons. She had always been eager to help those who needed her services, caring especially for the poor.

This fall and winter, however, had given her added means for usefulness; and now I learned how nobly she had improved those means. Besides her mother, she received only Mostyn and uncle Solon into her confidence; for she was one to shrink from exposing, or seeming to display her good works; and only imparted her plans to us, I could see, because she disliked to seem mysterious to those so near as we.

Mrs. Harrington, I think, often meditated seriously now, upon Elma's character and disposition. I think she was convinced of the wisdom of Elma's motives, in whatever she did; though she could not always tell whither those motives tended. The conviction forced itself upon her, from the consistency and steadiness of purpose visible in all her actions, and her gentle perseverance in whatever she considered right. She remarked to me, one day, that Elma seemed more economical than ever. But it was said in a thoughtful way, that showed she no longer looked with an unfavorable eye upon that economy. She allowed that Elma seemed to her to grow more "singular" every day; but she permitted her to be as singular as she pleased, now, saying to me: "I think, finally, it must be for some good purpose."

It was for a good purpose, as she found shortly. It was three days before Christmas, when a party of us, consisting of my cousin Harrington and Flora, Mrs. Mostyn and Charles, with my sister Emily and myself, visited, by especial favor, one of the private meetings of the — society, a new institution, formed for obtaining means for the relief of the poor in and about the neighboring districts, during the winter. It was a hard winter. Bread and fuel were scarcely to be obtained by many, and entirely beyond the reach of some.

This society was composed of a moderate number of young ladies and gentlemen, connected with the church to which my sister Emily belonged. We met several of our young acquaintances there, among the rest of whom was Elma.

The meeting was called to order, and the business of the hour quietly entered upon. A few words were spoken by the presiding member, relative to the object for which the society was formed, and some interesting remarks made, in regard to it; the clearness and brevity of which, in addition to the quiet, orderly, and perfectly business-like manner in which the meeting was conducted; and the serious, unmistakable earnestness evinced by every member, in the object before them, was proof sufficient that they clearly understood the business upon which they had entered, and had both the sense and determination to go through it correctly and steadily. Next, the names of the members were read, and the treasurer, list in hand, read off the amounts subscribed by each. Twenty names were given, the entire amount received being five hundred dollars. The last name was that of Elma Beverly—subscription seventy-five dollars. My cousin Harrington looked with astonishment, first at Elma, then at me.

"So this is the aim of Elma's economy?" she whispered. "Well, if I had guessed—"

I never knew my cousin Harrington so thoughtful before, as she was that day. Flora, Arabella and Caroline had no words to express themselves. Yes, this was the aim of Elma's economy—charity. And this was not the only instance. I went with my cousin Harrington, in the course of the day, to the cottage of a thrifty mechanic, on the outskirts of the city, where, in her rounds of charitable visiting, our Elma had found work to do.

"This is a hard winter, Mrs. Marsh," I said, to a pleasant, cheerful matron, who, with her bright, cleanly, healthy-looking children gathered about her, was waiting the return of her husband from his day's labor.

"A hard winter for many, sir," she answered, seriously; "but I am thankful, not a hard one for us, since Miss Beverly was so kind to us. I do not know what would have become of us all, if it had not been for her."

My cousin Harrington looked inquiringly at me, and then at our good hostess.

"You are acquainted with Miss Beverly, then, Mrs. Marsh?" she said, in a questioning tone.

"O, yes, ma'am," returned Mrs. Marsh, with a voice and look of pleased and heartfelt earnestness, "O, yes; if she had not helped us it would have gone hard with us this winter. My husband was ill all the fall—he fell and broke his arm in the early part of September. He did not leave his bed for two whole months. We had only his earnings to depend upon, and when he could no longer work, they failed us. We spent our last penny, and ate our last mouthful of bread. And then the landlord was just going to turn us out of doors, sick as James was, because we had no money to pay the rent. It was on that very day, when I thought James was dying, when my children were crying for bread, and we about to be turned like beasts, out into the open fields to perish, that Miss Beverly heard of our situation, and came to help us."

She paused a moment, and turned away her head to hide the starting tears.

"Well, and she helped you?" said my cousin Harrington, presently, in a sweeter, tenderer voice than I ever heard before from her lips.

"Ma'am," said Mrs. Marsh, simply and earnestly, turning towards us again, "Miss Beverly paid our rent—every penny of it; she got a good physician for my husband, who saved the life I thought was failing; she procured for us everything we needed, and brought us through till my husband was able to work again; and this nearly all out of her own means. I never can be too grateful to her, never; nor many another poor family about here that she has helped out of trouble."

Mrs. Harrington looked round at me. There were tears—absolutely tears, in her eyes.

"What a dear girl that Elma is!" she murmured.

I gave her better reason yet for saying so, before we returned home. I showed her, one after another, no less than six families, in different places, where Elma's visits were hailed, in the midst of poverty and distress, as those of a ministering angel; and she acknowledged that Elma had a noble end, indeed, for her economy; as I had had reason to acknowledge, long since.

When Christmas night came, we planned a happy gathering at the house of my sister Emily, where we found Elma surrounded by a delighted little party of children, invited by her, and for whom she had prepared a glorious Christmas tree. Mrs. Mostyn and my friend Charles were there with us. During the evening, there was found at the foot of the tree, a package directed to Elma. Opening it, she found two handsomely bound volumes, at the sight of which, the ever-ready color rushed impetuously to her cheek. They were the magazines which, five months before, she had resolutely denied herself the pleasure of purchasing. She looked incredulous for a moment. Then a glance at the fly-leaf settled the difficulty. She looked up with a yet more brilliant blush, at Charles, who stood beside her, regarding her with a quiet smile.

"It is your gift, Mr. Mostyn?" she said, earnestly.

"Yes, Elma. Will you take it from me?"

She did take it. And in a little while after—in the following spring, she took Charles Mostyn himself, as well. They are a happy husband and wife; and Elma is as good, as charitable—yes, and as economical and happier than ever.

A LOVELESS HOME.—There is no loneliness, there can be none in all the waste of peopled deserts of the world bearing the slightest comparison with that of an unloved wife! She stands amidst her family like a living statue amongst the marble memorials of the dead—instinct with life, yet paralyzed with death—the burning tide of natural feeling circling round her heart—the thousand channels frozen through which that feeling ought to flow.—Mrs. Ellis.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

HOME.

There is no great intrinsic merit in the poetry of Howard Payne's song of "Home Sweet Home," and yet there is no song that so thrills the popular heart, that is so sure to stir the blood and moisten the eye, whenever it is sung. This is because it appeals to a sentiment that inspires every breast. There is something in the very word "home" that awakens the most tender emotions.

"Though never so humble there's no place like home."

There is no flower so dear to us as the rose that blossoms by our garden gate, no water so bright and pure as that by the banks of which we have strayed in childhood, gathering the violets that clustered on its brink, or sailing our tiny boats upon its surface in anticipation of the great ventures and voyages of life. "We may wander away and mingle in the 'world's fierce strife,' and form new associations and friendships, and fancy that we have almost forgotten the land of our birth; but at some evening hour, as we listen perchance to the autumn winds, the remembrance of other days comes over the soul, and fancy bears us back to childhood's scenes, and we roam again amid the familiar haunts, and press the hands of the companions long since cold in their graves—and listen to voices we shall hear on earth no more. It is then a feeling of melancholy steals over us, which, like Ossian's music, is pleasant, though not mournful to the soul."

Rob Roy says that when his great enemy forced him to flee from his native district and take refuge in a safer place, that his wife Helen composed a lament so sad and woeful that the hearts of those who heard it died within them, and he adds: "I would not have that same touch of the heart-break again—no—not for all the broad lands once owned by the MacGregor." It is well known that, in the past century, the performance of the Ranz des Vaches by the band of the regiment of Swiss guards was forbidden. That simple mountain air, recalling to the military exiles their mountain home and the tender associations of their youth, rendered them so homesick that they could endure absence no longer, and deserted their colors in numbers. The same effect was produced in Canada among the Highland regiments by the performance of "Lochaber no more."

It has been truly and eloquently said: "The New England mariner, amid the icebergs of the northern seas, or breathing the spicy gales of the evergreen isles, or coasting along the shores of the Pacific, though the hand of time may have blanched his raven locks, and care have ploughed deep furrows on his brow, and his heart may have been chilled by the storms of the ocean, till the fountains of his love had almost ceased to gush with their heavenly current—yet, upon some summer's evening, as he looks upon the sun sinking behind the western wave, will think of home, and his heart will yearn for the loved days, and his tears will flow like the summer's rain. How does the heart of the wanderer, after long years of absence, beat, and his eyes fill, as he catches a glance of the hills of his nativity; and when he has pressed the lips of a mother or a sister, how soon does he hasten to see if the garden, and the orchard, and the stream, look as in days gone by. We may find climes as beautiful, and skies as bright, and friends as devoted, but that will not usurp the place of home."

SALUTATION.—Lord Brougham shakes hands with one finger, accompanying the act with a guttural and sepulchral "How ar-r-re you?"—rolling his r with the burr peculiar to the north of England, while the Middlesex yeoman gives you a grip that almost dislocates your fingers.

LIGHT AND HEALTH.—Persons who live in rooms where the sunlight enters freely and the walls are light, enjoy better health than those who exclude the sun's rays and live in sombre-colored apartments.

SCARE-CROWS.—Scare-crows in gardens are humbugs. Birds have been known to make their nests in the pockets of a scare-crow.

THE OLDEST ONE.—Rev. Dr. Spring is the oldest clergyman in New York. He has occupied his pulpit forty-six years.

THEIR USE.—The true use of cockroaches, as all truly wise people have known for years, is to flavor fine old Burgundy with.

THE ELYSIAN FIELDS.

It is thus that the Parisians style one of their most attractive public places. All sorts of trades flourish famously in the Elysian Fields—beggars abound there, flower girls, musicians, all sorts of people. Music is represented there by numerous virtuosi, who offer their concerts to the promenaders, and even painting has established itself in these domains. The idler is accosted by a young man, who says to him :

"Sir, shall I sketch your portrait for ten cents?"

"No, I thank you."

"Don't refuse, I beg of you. You'll do a good deed and make a bargain. I'll warrant the likeness. Only ten cents, and ten minutes time. You can't afford to do without a likeness, when you get it so cheap."

"Very well—go ahead."

The young man instantly takes his pencil from his pocket, and a leaf from a book that he carries under his arm, and lays it flat on his knee, which serves him for a desk.

"Stand a little further off," says the subject; "I don't want to attract people's attention."

"As you please; I can hit a likeness at ten paces."

The artist places himself at the required distance, and in ten minutes brings the portrait. What is stranger yet, the portrait is an admirable likeness, and by no means contemptible as a work of art; for the faculty of drawing is almost universal in Paris. For ten cents! Talent is certainly cheap now-a-days.

Seduced by the price, a gentleman who was in the Elysian Fields the other night with his wife, a young and pretty woman, had his portrait taken, and was so well pleased with it that he said to the artist, "Now you may take my wife." The artist resumed his work, and at the moment when he was putting the last pencil-touch to it, and giving a glance of satisfaction at the picture which, through the inspiration of the model's beauty, he had executed admirably, a young man hastily seized the paper, threw the sketcher a twenty-franc piece, and disappeared with his prize. The gentleman was furious, and rushed home with his wife, declaring that he would never again set foot in the Elysian Fields.

All the celebrities of the gay French capital may be seen in the Elysian Fields. That young man on the blooded horse has just come into possession of a fortune of eight millions. That splendid carriage, with the servants in mourning livery, belongs to Lord Harry Seymour. That smiling dandy in the tilbury has lost more than a hundred thousand crowns in stock speculations within a few weeks. One of these fine days, he'll pay his creditors—perhaps. That gentleman of an uncertain age, in a splendid caleche, drawn by two superb horses in glittering harness, is the illustrious Mr. Auher, at once a composer, a sportsman and a gentleman. In fact, the Elysian Fields is a world in itself.

MORE CAMELS COMING.—The United States government like the camels they imported so well, that they have sent for more. The travelling powers of the camel are truly extraordinary. Col. Chesney, of the British army, rode with three companions, and without change of camel, from Baarah to Damascus, a distance of 960 miles, in nineteen days and three or four hours, thus averaging fifty miles a day, the camels having no food but such as they gathered themselves at halting places on the road. Ninety miles in a single day is no unusual performance for one of these desert ships.

SELLING A BANKER.—Daniel Fish, Esq., president of the Farmers' Bank, in Lansingburg, N. Y., lately bought a pair of oxen of a stranger, and paid him in Farmers' Bank bills, urging him to give them a wide circulation for the good of the bank. In about two hours, the real owner of the cattle, from whom they had been stolen, made his appearance and regained his property. The bills, however, are no doubt having a "wide circulation."

SELF ESTEEM.—Malherbe, the French poet, was one of the vainest of men. The Princess of Conti one day said to him, "I want to show you the finest verses in the world which you have never seen." Malherbe replied: "I beg your pardon, I have seen them; for, if they are the finest verses in the world, I must certainly have written them myself."

A NOBLE SENTIMENT.—The Prussian school counsellor Dinton nobly said: "I promised God that I would look upon every Prussian peasant child as a being who could complain of me before God, if I did not provide him the best education as a man and a Christian which it was possible for me to provide."

NOT TO BE SLIGHTED.—A country editor thinks that Richelieu, who declared that "the pen was mightier than the sword," ought to have spoken a good word for scissors.

GLOVES.—A new style of white kid gloves, beautifully embroidered with gold thread or colored silks, has been introduced from Paris.

THE IMAGE-MEN.

Our streets swarm with Italians; you may know them at a glance by their bright black eyes and their olive complexions, bearing on their heads boards loaded down with plaster images—figures of Washington, Napoleon, and the Greek Slave, heads of Daniel Webster and of Henry Clay. Their humble garments are white with the dust of plaster of Paris. They are as plentiful as hand-organ men, and their productions bear the same relation to sculpture that the hand-organ does to music. They adopt a fashionable subject and popularize it, acknowledging and propagating its success at once. The image-vender's board is a sort of portable museum. Its contents vary with the popular pulse; the idols of the crowd figure there for a moment, and then give way to some new darling of the fickle world. The ancients erected statues of brass, which wars and revolutions soon overthrew: wiser in this, we content ourselves with moulding in plaster our momentary idolatries, as if we would symbolize by the fragility of the matter the fragility of what it represents.

Alas! how many of these reputations have not enjoyed even the duration of the plaster that celebrated them! How many great men have disappeared before their busts! The image-man is a terrible judge; he records, so to speak, the sentence of the century. The popularity passed, he pitilessly breaks the mould, and the work or the man, illustrious a few days before, returns immediately into obscurity. Considered from another point of view, the image-vender has a truly important position in our modern civilization. He contributes to the spread of art, to the education, and insensibly elevates the popular taste.

When we compare the plaster heads, figures and medallions, now in circulation, to those of thirty or even twenty years ago—white rabbits and painted mandarins were then the marketable staples—we are struck with a decided progress in form and style. Really very creditable reductions of the works of Thorwaldsen, of Canova, and of Powers, are sold by these itinerant art-merchants. It is evident that the interval which separated popular art from exclusive art is every day diminishing. The coarsest lithographs, sold for a few cents, have a vague reflection of the works they copy. We see that the hand is more skilful, the eye better trained, the workman rising into the artist.

This increasing elevation in works of an inferior order is an important symptom. It proves that the plastic arts are entwining themselves more and more with our habits, and becoming domesticated; that after having been the privilege of the dwellings of the rich, they tend to become the embellishment of humbler dwellings. This is more than mere progress—it is a revolution, revealing a decided ascensive movement in the intellectual education of the greatest number. So that we view these plaster-covered missionaries of art, humble as they are, with great favor, and trust that they will never be regarded as nuisances, however far the organs and the monkeys fall under the ban; and even towards these we are not unkindly disposed.

STORY TELLING.

An English writer says: "If there is much to be rejected in the French models, there is much to be learned from them. They at least set us an excellent example in looking for subjects close at hand, and treating them with vivacity. An English story that should be as true in its pictures of life, and as rapid and vivid in its treatment, would be as good in its kind as a French story. But we must get rid of our old lazy way of setting about these matters before we can achieve such a consummation. We must shuffle off the traditional descriptions, the oppressive reflections, the sleepy dialogue, the bits of scenery which have nothing to do with the action, and all other extraneous fineries which are inserted only to show off the literary accomplishments of the author; and we must go straight to the vital interest, and keep it to the end. But the subject is a large one, and if we were to yield to its temptations, would carry us much farther than we originally intended. The few points we have hastily indicated are enough for the present."

POOR FELLOW.—The king of Oude, whose territory the British have "absorbed," "sequestered," or "appropriated"—not annexed, O no!—is in England with his pockets full of rupees, trying to buy back his possessions!

OUR BEST SOCIETY.—Such is the amplitude of ladies' dresses now that it is difficult for gentlemen to find room in any place of fashionable resort. They must hover about the out-skirts.

RELIC.—They pretend to have dug up a printing press at Mentz, bearing the initials of Gutenberg and the date of 1441, but we, however, are a little incredulous.

AN ILLINOIS STAPLE.—Galena has exported during the last twelve months $2,000,000 worth of lead.

IMAGINATION.

It is a fine thing to have a fertile imagination, provided it is held in proper subjection by the reasoning faculties; provided it is a well-bitted, easy-going nag, held well in hand, and not a head-strong courser, defying snaffle and curb, and ready to run away with its rider on the slightest provocation. Halleck says:

—“A man may sit
Upon a bright throne of his own creation,
Untortured by the ghastly shapes that fill
Around the many whose exalted station
Has been attained by means 'twere pain to hint on.”

No one can deny the possession of the faculty of imagination to Alexander Dumas, the great French story-teller—great, in spite of his being an unmitigated plagiarist. A curious instance of it is mentioned by an English writer, who lately paid a visit to his chateau of Monte Cristo, near Paris. “On reaching the garden,” he says, “I was conducted by a small path toward what the Cerberus in charge called ‘the Island of Monte Cristo.’ I had seen many wonders, but this beat them all. The island—well, I should see—I looked round. I perceived neither water nor island, nor any probability of either, as we were walking up the side of a hill; but I had looked too far; I had miscalculated the extent of the territory, and taken too literally the creation of Dumas’s brain—for the island was before me, separated from the ground on which we stood by a ditch about a foot broad, crossed by a plank! It is a fine thing to have a brilliant imagination; it is, indeed, a real blessing, for with such a gift the Barmecides’ feast would be greater than a Lord Mayor’s banquet! Monsieur Dumas seems imbued with this qualification to no ordinary extent; he sees in this minute ditch a mighty, rushing, rolling ocean—the blue Mediterranean dashing on the beach of Marseilles, for instance; in this plank, magnificent arches of marble spanning the rising waves; and on the space enclosed by the mighty breakers (in reality about a dozen yards square), no other than the island on which stands the Chateau d’If, that rocky majestic mass rising from the Mediterranean, crowned with its antique castles, within whose dungeons Dantes, alias Monte Cristo, sighed!

“When Dumas retires to the Island of Monte Cristo (only hear how grand that sounds) he is not to be disturbed on any consideration. With much solemnity the small plank—alias majestic bridge—is pompously removed, and as no mortal can traverse alive the terrific torrent flowing between the mainland of flower beds and the island of weeds, his solitude must be respected, and Dumas sits down peacefully to compose one of his most amusing books.” But poor Dumas’s imagination was a nag without a bridle, and run away with him. He really fancied that he was the Count of Monte Cristo, and possessed of the exhaustless wealth of that fabulous gentleman, and so incurred ruinous expenses, plunged deeply into debt, and is now we believe, pecuniarily, what is vulgarly termed, “used up.”

AN ACTRESS’S LOVE.

The history of the marriage of Ristori, the great Italian tragic actress, now electrifying London, is a page of romance. The London News says: “Adelaide Ristori made her first appearance on the stage at the early age of two months. Her parents were members of a strolling company of players. At twelve we find her entering into the king of Sardinia’s company of actors. Here she had the advantage of excellent teaching. She rose rapidly in public estimation; visited Leghorn, where she was entirely successful, and afterwards accepted of an engagement at Rome. Here the heir of the Marquis Capranica del Grillo proposed for ‘the Ristori;’ but the aristocratical friends of the lover were immediately up in arms. He was shut up in the Roman States, without any power of exit, while the object of his love was obliged to depart to keep an engagement in Florence. Ristori managed to reach her lover, and they were married secretly, although they were shortly after obliged to separate. The separation was but for a short time. The husband bought a passport made out in favor of another person, effected his escape from the Roman States, and rejoined his wife in her box at Florence at the moment when she entered it, loaded with bouquets and presents, after one of her greatest theatrical triumphs.”

FOR EVERY FIRESIDE.—All who have seen Ballou’s Dollar Monthly admit it to be the cheapest magazine in the world, with its hundred pages of reading matter in each number, besides two pages of original humorous illustrations.—New England Farmer.

GOOD IDEA.—The college boys at New Haven, Conn., are about to erect a large and well-appointed gymnasium. It is as important to cultivate the physical as the mental endowments.

TO OUR READERS.—Every leaded article in Ballou’s Dollar Monthly is written expressly for the proprietor and is liberally paid for.

EXTENSIVE.—The telegraphic wires which intersect the various parts of the United States, are sufficiently long to extend around the world.

THE COURSE OF EMPIRE.

The course of empire pursues inflexibly the apparent course of the sun from East to West. The far East was the cradle of the race. Thence multiplying and expanding, the mighty army moved westward and halted for a time on the confines of Europe and the outskirts of Africa. In its progress, the mighty Assyrian and Babylonian empires rose and fell; the wilderness blossomed, was covered with splendid cities—worlds in themselves—and then withered to a desert. Egypt had its centuries of glory followed by its centuries of night. Greece and Rome flourished for a season, and then fell. After civilization and humanity had set up their beacon towers on the heights of Europe, the Saracenic wave, sweeping along the southern shores of the Mediterranean, rolled into Spain at the pillars of Hercules, and threatening to overtop the Pyrenees, menaced Europe with a Moslem deluge, and was stayed by one of those decisive battles which settle for ages the fortunes of empire. Then the old world, reviving and putting forth new strength, stretched her arm out to the West. At the appointed season, an entire new world, a virgin bride, was given to the great family of nations. Westward still the star of empire rolled.

In the new hemisphere humanity has exhibited an original phase of character; with the same old passions, the same old aspirations, but with a far different energy and a far more vital impulse. The offspring of European colonists planted on these shores have performed in little more than three centuries an amount of work which had ever occupied many centuries in the slow process of civilization of which ancient history offers us the record. With all the evidences of prosperity, and strength, and enduring glory that surround us, it is difficult to believe that our country will ever know the withering decay that overtook the empires of the old world and of old times. Yet such must be its fate. Our cities, after having reached a height of splendor never before known in the world, must crumble to ruins; our ports must know no more the gladness of myriad sails; our busy millions must be laid beneath a desolate soil. The star of empire will continue to perform its circuit. Asia will again be great and glorious in the cycle of centuries, and the old drama of civilization be re-enacted on the self-same stage; for history is not only the mirror of the past—it is the magic glass in which we read the future.

RICH LIVING.—At a banquet in Japan, Commodore Perry was treated to eleven courses of soup and gingerbread.

MUNIFICENT DONATION.

Among the literary treasures of this vicinity, scholars have long known of the existence of a fine private library, the property of Mr. Joseph Dowse, of Cambridge. Mr. Dowse, who is now more than eighty years of age, made the collection himself, and the Hon. Edward Everett, in one of his published addresses, speaks strongly of the value of the books, and the taste evinced by their owner in its selection. The collection of such a library is the more remarkable since Mr. Dowse is not a member of the literary fraternity, and in early life enjoyed only very ordinary educational advantages. He is by trade, we believe, a leather-dresser, but has had the good taste to devote some of his honorable earnings in the purchase of good books, and his leisure to making himself thoroughly acquainted with their contents. He has performed a generous act which merits the highest praise: he has presented the Massachusetts Historical Society with the whole of his costly and cherished library, on the sole condition that the books shall be kept together. At a special meeting of the Society, of which Hon. Robert C. Winthrop is president, this magnificent donation was announced by Mr. Winthrop, who spoke of it as it deserved, Mr. Everett and others following.

The Massachusetts Historical Society consists of sixty members, and originated, in 1790, with Dr. Jeremy Belknap, Judge Minot and others, who were desirous of preserving historical papers and gathering historical fact. The society owns and occupies the stone building on the south side of the Boston Museum, in which there is a fine library and a picture gallery containing many valuable portraits. Their published "Collections," containing a vast amount of choice historical documents, numbers fifty-three volumes.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS.—As we expected, the introduction into Ballou's Dollar Monthly of a couple of original pages of humorous illustrations has caused it to increase very largely in circulation. It was the cheapest magazine in the world before this, but now we are giving still more for the money in each number. This feature will be continued in each issue.

TAXES.—We see it stated that the carriage tax paid in London amounts this year to $2,912,265; but there must be a mistake in the figuring.

BATHING.—In all our great cities there ought to be free baths for the people. As it is, bathing is too costly a luxury for the poor.

FAME.

What little things serve to make a man famous or notorious, to stir up nations and even produce wars! Little did Professor Mahan think, when he presented himself for admission in his neat and modest West Point uniform, that his buff vest and black neckcloth would the next day rouse up all England at the bidding of the trumpet-tongued thunderer of the "Times." But so it was. The Tory journals banged away at Mr. Mahan and Mr. Dallas, and insisted that it was an insult to the queen. She, poor woman, had never dreamed of such a thing. She was willing to admit the black stock and the buff vest, and we suspect rated her master of ceremonies for excluding them. But a tempest in a teapot was caused by those offending articles of dress. After all said, however, one thing is certain. If our countrymen can't be contented without presentation to loyalty, they ought to submit to court usages, and put on the embroidered coat and small clothes, the cocked hat, and wear the dress sword—silly as the usage is. If they don't choose to dress as the court ninnies do, they had better stay away. This remark does not apply to Professor Mahan, for as he wore his official uniform, he no doubt thought he was all right. Probably, however, he will not be in a hurry soon to be presented to royalty, but will be contented with such glimpses of it as he can catch in the streets on public occasions, or in the theatre, and other public places.

THE GREAT COMET.—The astronomer, M. Babinet, member of the Academy of Sciences, and M. Bomme, of Middleburg, Holland, have been making some investigations in respect to the return of the great comet which appeared in the years 104, 392, 682, 975, 1264, and 1556. The result gives the arrival of this rare visitor in August, 1858, with an uncertainty of two years, more or less.

GOING BACKWARDS.—An English sportsman lately made his horse, for a large wager, go backwards five-eighths of a mile in five minutes, thirty-seven seconds. You'd never catch a Yankee doing that. His motto for horses and everything else is—"Go ahead!"

EXTRA-VA-GANCE.—It cost a fortune to baptize the prince of France, and now it will cost another fortune to pay Couture for painting a picture of the ceremony.

RUSSIA.—This great country will export very little, if any grain this season. This is one of the consequences of the war.

CATCHING A COURTIER.

Louis XIV. said one day to Marshal Grammont: "Mr. Marshal, just read this madrigal and see if you have ever seen anything more impertinent. Because I love poetry, they bring me all sorts of stuff!" The marshal, after having read it, said to the king: "Your majesty judges everything divinely—it is certainly the stupidest and most ridiculous effusion I ever read." The king laughed and said: "You will acknowledge the fellow who did this must be a blockhead?" "Sire," replied the courtier, "you can't call him anything else." "Well," said the king, "I am delighted you have spoken so frankly. I did it myself." "Ah, your majesty!" exclaimed Grammont; "you are joking! But give me the paper again. I read it very hastily, and first impressions are often deceptive." "No, Mr. Marshal," replied the king, "on the contrary, first impressions are generally the most natural and correct." The king was much amused at this incident, and the world thought it was a nice trick to play off on a man who lived by flattery. Grammont, however, did not get over his mortification for a long time.

GOOD SENSE.—Louis XV. was no fool, though he was a king. One day, in the office of the minister of war, he found a pair of spectacles. "Let us see," said he, "if they suit my eyes." He put them on, and taking up a manuscript, read a pompous eulogy of himself. "That wont do," said he to the Duke de Choiseul, pulling off the glasses; "they are no better than my own—they magnify too much."

TERRIBLE LOSSES.—Between the first of January and the first of July last, there have been lost at sea three hundred and thirty American vessels, the amount sacrificed being $15,896,506, which includes, however, repairs of damages to vessels that came into port disabled during the same period. This destruction is unparalleled in our commercial history.

ECONOMICAL.—A lady can dress in this country for a very reasonable sum. Lace mantillas in Broadway are almost given away at a thousand dollars apiece!

FRIENDSHIP.—How true it is that you will go through life friendless, if you insist on seeking for a fidus Achates without a fault!

COOL COSTUME.—Somebody proposes for summer a suit of India rubber, to be filled with ice water.

Foreign Miscellany.

The receipts of the English railways for the past six months were $49,763,310 1

In the past three years 4725 horses have been eaten by the poor of Vienna.

The obelisk at Inkermann, commemorative of the battle, has just been completed.

The Russians are sending money to the sufferers at Lyons. Only think of it.

The new Manchester (Eng.) Exchange is said to be the largest room in Europe.

The annual cost of keeping the London streets in repair is £1,800,000 sterling.

The commerce of St. Petersburg, Russia, has been very brisk since the peace.

On one of the railroads in France beds are furnished to the passengers.

A Russian baroness has lately been fined a thousand dollars for forging and swindling.

An explosion recently occurred at the Cymmer coal mines, near Cardiff. One hundred and ten men were killed.

It is proposed in London to establish a "Brigade of Guides" to the "sights" of that city, such brigade to consist of intelligent lads in want of employment.

There are now 4996 petitions on the table of the English Commons House, against opening the British Museum on Sundays, signed by 629,178 persons.

There is talk in London of forming an "Old Mortality Club," for the purpose of recutting and preserving inscriptions on monuments to persons of eminence.

The English frigate Terrible, now at Malta, is said to have been rendered completely unfit for service from the ravages committed by the destructive insects which abound in the Black Sea.

While the travelling Russians are pouring over the Prusso-Russian frontier, there is a stream of French invading the Czar's territory—teachers, dancing masters, cooks, actors, and artists of all sorts.

Eupatoria has been completely given up to the Russians, who have hoisted their flag there. The 1200 Turks who remained there embarked for Constantinople on the same day that the town was restored.

At a recent sale in Paris, a letter of the poet Corneille was sold for $200. At the same sale a letter of Fenelon was sold for $12 50; one of Rochefoucauld for $70; and a signature of Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits, for $40.

The Paris Moniteur contains an account of the steps which have been taken by M. Delavo, the proprietor of the estate of Marengo, to "transform that celebrated field of battle into a living souvenir of the victory."

The Greenock Advertiser says that a man was nearly poisoned by sucking an egg which he found floating in a river, the egg being impregnated with strychnine in order to kill common crows. A whole family, too, narrowly escaped poisoning by a hare impregnated with the same deadly substance for a similar purpose.

It is expected that Mile. Rachel will soon reappear upon the stage.

There is positively a standing army of actors in Germany—they are literally legion.

The Collins line of steamers receives $858,000 a year for carrying the mail.

Madagascar, the most fertile island of the tropics, is to be invaded by the French.

In Paris they are wearing white kid gloves, richly embroidered with gold.

The Grand Duke Michael is betrothed to the youngest sister of the Regent of Baden.

Naples letters say that signs of revolt are more frequent, and even the army is discontented.

France lost 40,000 out of her 200,000 soldiers engaged in the Russian war.

Sir Charles Fox and Mr. Henderson have contracted to rebuild Covent Garden Opera House in six months.

Queen Victoria has conferred the title and dignity of Baronet of the United Kingdom on Sir Allen M'Nab, late prime minister in Canada.

The Emperor Nicholas is reported to have left memoirs of his reign, to be published five years hence.

Some disturbances have occurred in Copenhagen, from Mormon preachers. The military arrested the offenders.

The Crimea has been entirely evacuated, excepting the allied ships carrying away hewn stone and iron from Sebastopol.

"The King of Sweden has conferred a gold medal on Mr. Anderson, author of "Lake Nagnami; or, Explorations and Discoveries in South-Western Africa."

A bill is in preparation for revising the usury laws in Prussia. The interest on loans is to be allowed to go as high as 10 per cent.; and a higher rate is to be punished as swindling.

It has been discovered that several copies of a seditious manifesto were lately sent from Brussels cleverly to Paris, packed in the interior of a large lobster.

The married ladies of Honolulu have lately presented a petition to the legislature, praying for the suppression of theatres and circuses, on the ground that they kept their husbands out all night.

Louis Napoleon has so far made amends for his spoliation of the Orleans family, as to propose paying to each of the daughters of Louis Philippe, or their heirs, an allowance of 200,000 francs.

The Northern Railroad in France carried, in 1855, no less than 5,500,000 passengers, equal to about one-sixth of the whole population of France. Of this number, 600,000 rode in first class cars, 1,500,000 in second class, and 3,400,000 in third class.

Capital punishments are extremely rare in Denmark, and when one does occur it creates an immense sensation. A woman was recently decapitated in the province of Julland, where it is certain no execution has taken place for three hundred years, and the event was witnessed by upwards of 20,000 people.

Record of the Times.

Congress has granted a pension of fifty dollars a month for five years to Decatur's widow.

The present population of Cuba is estimated to be about one million six hundred thousand.

The most popular men are seldom those of very shining qualities or strong virtues.

On Quinsigamond Pond, Worcester, they have a boat propelled by electricity.

When a man is willing to appear poor, he deprives penury of its sting.

Blanchard's bent ship knees are found to be superior to natural knees.

Campbell says that the word daisy signifies the "eye of the day."

In England our Bigelow Carpet-Weaving Machine is making a sensation.

Americans surpass Europeans in photographs, daguerreotypes and ambrotypes.

The United States is larger than the Roman empire was at its zenith.

The West India sugar crop has been very large the present season.

England boasts of her great wits, but New England can show a Whittier.

Roger Bacon in 1274 described gunpowder as a common plaything everywhere.

Two women lately engaged in a prize fight near Gloucester, N. Y.

Let a man understand you think him faithful and it makes him so.

Agricultural laborers are very scarce at the West, and in parts of Wisconsin and Iowa, the farmers are offering as high as $2 25 per day.

Strakosch is worth two hundred thousand dollars, one-half of which is in Chicago, in real estate which cost him not more than $15,000.

The chimney of a vitriol factory in Providence, now building, is to be 214 feet high, 20 feet in diameter at the base, and 10 feet at the top. It is built thus high to carry off poisonous fumes.

Some of the newspapers are arguing in favor of making rail cars wholly of iron, and steamboats of the same material, so far as is practicable, to avoid disasters from conflagration.

A Reformed Dutch church is now in the process of erection in Chicago. This will be the only edifice belonging to that denomination in that city.

A bank note detector gives the number of banks in the United States whose notes have not been counterfeited or altered at 463, and the number whose notes have been counterfeited or altered at 854.

The following remarkable coincidence took place in St. Francis County, Ark., a short time ago:—"A one-eyed man stole a one-eyed mule, was arrested by a one-eyed sheriff, and tried before a one-eyed officer."

A river fire steamer has just been built at Cincinnati, constructed like a ferry boat, and having a fixed steam fire engine on board, to be used in the port of St. Louis in case of a fire occurring among the steamboats at the levee.

The remains of a marble palace have been discovered under a garden in the Isle of Capri.

Mr. Vieux Temps, the violinist, lately made $8000 in a four months' tour.

Thirty or forty persons make a trade of bringing dogs to the City Pound in New York.

The first printing press set up in America was worked at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1639.

An artist of Cincinnati has been painting a panorama of the Bible.

Those that govern best make the least noise. Power is quiet.

A little speck of temptation soon enlarges to a thunder-cloud.

A thimbleful of powder will split a rock of forty square feet.

The national debt of England is the security of her government and nobles.

Brilliant thoughts are slow in their formation, like the diamond.

A book has been curiously defined as a "brain preserved in ink."

It wasn't Bulwer that said the scissors were mightier than the sword.

A Mr. Coon (same old?) is about to establish a paper in Wisconsin.

The art of printing was denounced at first as magic—it seems like enchantment.

A New York company is engaged in excavating the old copper mines at Southington.

A great parade of the New York Fire Department will take place on the 18th of October.

The business men of Indianapolis have organized a permanent Board of Trade.

It is stated that the apple crop of Pennsylvania will be very heavy.

A Mr. Marie of Paris is said to have discovered a way of keeping meat untainted without salt.

The famous watering place, Bedford Springs, Pa., have been sold to the Broad Top Railroad Company, for the round sum of $186,000.

One hundred millions of dollars worth of hay will be raised in the United States this year—equal in value to the cotton crop.

Martin Bryant, Esq., of Pembroke, is said to be the proprietor of fourteen cats, and spreads a table especially for their benefit.

Lieut. Maury has accepted an invitation to deliver a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute in this city next winter.

The first daily newspaper published in Virginia was in 1780, and the subscription price was $50 per copy per annum.

There are eighteen establishments for manufacturing steel in our country; these have a capacity for making 14,000 tons per annum. We have the best ores in the world for making steel.

Coffee is a native of Abyssinia, and not of Arabia, as many believe, and abounds in the province of Kaffa, whence it derives its name. The coffee tree was not transplanted from Abyssinia into Asia until the fifteenth century, when its culture was begun in Arabia Felix, where, in the environs of Mocha, it grows to perfection.

Merry Making.

If you want to see a black squall, just look at a negro baby attacked with the colic.

"Come, get up, it's time to rise," as Mr. Squizzle said to his railroad shares.

"Don't believe it," is the rather suggestive catch phrase at the commencement of a patent medicine advertisement.

It is a popular delusion to think that an editor is a public bellows, bound to puff everything and everybody that wants to see him.

A lady told her husband she read the "Art of Love" on purpose to be agreeable to him. "I had rather have love without art," replied he.

Every one at the bottom of his heart cherishes vanity; even the toad thinks himself good looking—rather tawny, perhaps, but look at his eyes!

How can a man who has no wings be said to be "winged" in an affair of honor? Because in fighting a duel he makes a goose of himself.

"Pray, can you tell me," lisped an exquisite, "why I always pause after the first syllable of 'cupid'?" It is because I love to stop when I come to c u.

This is a world of compensations. Kick a boy for chalking on your fence, and he will balance the account by throwing a brickbat at the first friendless dog he runs against.

An Irishman lately bought a family Bible, and, taking it home, made his first entry in it thus: "Patrick O'Donohoe—born Sept. 20th, 1836, aged three years."

A witness in court, being interrogated as to his knowledge of the defendant in the case, said he knew him intimately well. He had supped with him, sailed with him, and horse-whipped him.

A Frenchman gasconading over the inventive genius of his country, said: "We invented lace ruffles!" "Ay," said John Bull, "and we added shirts to them."

"You bachelors ought to be heavily taxed," said a lady to an old 'un. "True, ma'am," said the foggy, "bachelorism is undoubtedly a great luxury."

The woodman who "spared that tree" has run short of wood, and is almost splitting with vexation to think how green he was. He now "axes" a donation.

"Mary, I'm glad your heel has got well." "Why?" said Mary, opening wide her large blue eyes with astonishment. "O, nothing, only I see it is able to be out."

"Is them old fellows alive now?" said an urchin to his teacher. "What old persons do you mean, my dear?" "Why, Paul, and Luke, and Deuteronomy, and them."

"Molly, I think you'll never set the river on fire," said a lady to her servant. "Indeed, I'd never be after doing anything so wicked, ma'am—I'd be burning up the little fishes," innocently replied Molly.

I met her in the sunset bright, her gingham gown was blue; her eyes that danced with pure delight were of the same dear hue. And always when the sun goes down I think of the girl in the gingham gown.

When a carpenter is sitting up the inside of a store, he's a counter-fitter.

What gentleman can, with any sense of propriety, ask a fat lady to lean on his arm?

Some people think an editor is a public bellows, bound to puff everybody.

A man who tries to bolt a door with a boiled carrot must be absent-minded.

Why is a man who prefers his oysters on the half shell like a prima donna? Because both are fond of fu-ror.

What is the difference between a confirmed sinner and a beggar? One is a mend-i-cant and the other is a mend-i-wont.

A printer once described a clever clergyman as a "full-headed article with a white line after it."

One virtue, at least, has been discovered in the hooped petticoat; mad dogs cannot bite the wearers. Excellent things for summer wear!

A Yankee, who has just commenced the study of Italian, wants to know how it is, if they have no w in that language, that "them chaps spells wagon?"

If a spoonful of yeast will raise fifty cents' worth of flour, how much will it take to raise funds enough to buy a barrel? Answer to be handed in over the fence.

A man may, from hurry, or forgetfulness, or absence of mind, or some strong excitement, make his appearance without his wig, but when did a woman forget hers?—Punch.

A person of our acquaintance asked another how old he thought Miss R— was. "I do not know her age exactly?" he replied; "she varies from seventeen to twenty-five."

Theodore Hook said to an alderman who had already surfeited him, and yet pressed him to partake of still another course—"I thank you; but if it's the same to you, I'll take the rest in money."

If you are a very precise man, and wish to be certain of what you get, never marry a girl named Ann, for we have the authority of Lindley Murray, and others, that "Ann is an indefinite article."

"How much do you pay your waiters at this saloon?" asked an irascible gent of the proprietor of a restaurant. "One dollar per diem, sir." "Well, then, credit me with thirty cents, for I waited two hours for my steak and one hour for my muffins!"

Lord Stanford told Moore that Lady Caroline Lamb, in a moment of passion, had knocked down one of her pages with a stool. "Well," said the poet, "it is nothing uncommon for a literary lady to double down a page."

An orphan girl of 20, with $5000 a year, advertises herself in a New York paper as wanting a handsome and respectable young man in marriage. She prints her picture, and it is pretty, and hails from Springfield.

A GOOD PRU.—Theodore Hook once said to a literary man, at whose table his publisher had become intoxicated: "My dear sir, you seem to have emptied your wine-cellar into your book-seller."

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. IV.—No. 5.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER, 1856.

WHOLE No. 23.

THE CHILD OF THE SEA.

BY EMERET H. SEDGE.

On the eastern coast of Newfoundland, between Cape St. Francis and the little town St. Johns, was a narrow estuary, which extending inland a short distance, was met by a small and rapid stream, the waters of which it first rebuffed and then swallowed up in its briny wave. The rocky wall on one side retired just enough to leave room for a fisherman's hut, with a gradual slope of ground between it and the ocean. Behind the house there might have been an equal extent of surface reduced to good cultivation, and producing hardy vegetables and a few stunted trees.

It was already past the middle of the last half of a sultry summer's day. The only occupant of the little area was a young girl of about fourteen years, who went from the hut to the beach, from the rocks to the garden, from the forsaken old boat to the little flower border, in a capricious circuit; bounding over the hard soil with captivating grace, clambering in dangerous places with agile daring, then disposing some domestic labor with busy care, or looking with anxious gaze out on the solitary water. Her face was sweet and beautiful; the rough sea winds had no power to sully its rare whiteness, and the chilling mists could not drive the roses from the round cheek and full lips; and her little hand, too, as she raised it to shade for an instant her large dark eyes or to toss back the long truant curls, gleamed like the snowy wing of a bird. Though there was no other human being near her, she did not feel either fear or loneliness, for a great, shaggy and powerful dog, a native of the island, was her constant companion and protector, and almost sympathizing friend. A more than brute intelligence seemed to glow in his eyes as he watched the wistful gaze of his young mistress, who, resting her hand upon his long, curly hair, paused again to carefully survey the ocean prospect before her, and then to observe the thunder-cloud which threw up its gleaming fantastic pillars from behind the cliff.

"They were to have been here early this morning, did you know it, Christy?" said the girl. The dog wagged his tail in the affirmative.

"It is very strange, isn't it?" she continued.

"They must come in sight soon. I am afraid they are lost in the fog, and there will certainly be a dreadful storm before midnight, wont there?"

Christy looked with his mistress towards the straggling cloud that was rapidly rising to obscure the sun, and uttered a long, mournful howl.

"O, don't do so. Keep up your spirits, Christy. Perhaps they are in sight already. We'll go out upon the crag and look for them."

The dog, as if he fully comprehended the words, moved on before towards the place indicated, and with grave pace wound his way among the loose rocks and up the rugged ascent. The young girl kept close behind, and with voice and eye and caress showed her loving admiration of his huge, supple, undulating form, and bestowed her unstinted praise upon the dog, which now and then looked round in acknowledgement. They came out upon the crag that hung low over the water and projected farther into the ocean than any neighboring point. The girl bent forward and sent her heedful sight in every direction. All along the coast and about half a mile from it, lay a thick, heavy fog-bank close upon the sea, that sunk down dense and compact, and wrapped its chilling folds about like a winding-sheet.

The girl was tired and disappointed, and with a sigh she sat down, and leaning her hand upon Christy, looked on the waters as they gave their tumultuous greeting of spray and gurgling foam to the repelling shore. But there was no cheer in their rushing voice, and she grew more sad till the quick tears came into her eyes and blinded her. A sudden thought struck her, and she sprang to her feet, exclaiming with a forced smile:

"Father Mahan says I must not hearken to the waves when they talk despondingly, for then they tempt me into a greivous sin against the Holy One; and surely they never were so full of the spirit of evil as they are at this hour, and I am very weak."

Christy gave a sharp bark, not in response, however, but at the fog-bank from which there shot out the same instant a large row boat, containing two individuals, that rapidly drew near the shore, accelerated by the hasty strokes of the oars and the flowing tide. As it appeared, the shadow left the face of the tearful girl, and she clapped her hands exultingly; but her joy was soon turned to hesitation, then to complete disappointment, when she perceived that the boat did not contain those whom she expected, but strangers. Whoever they might be, they were evidently unacquainted with the locality, for not heeding the half-concealed estuary, they made for a deceptive but impossible landing-place in another direction. The girl, aware of the danger to which they were exposed in their passage among the rocks, seized the hat from her head and swinging aloft, shouted at the top of her voice. Christy, not behindhand in benevolent intent, barked in his own sturdy fashion. Their united demonstration gained the attention of the sailors, who immediately bent their course towards the crag, but not before the girl, venturing too near the edge of the rock in her earnestness, slipped and fell into the waters beneath. In the twinkling of an eye Christy also disappeared in the deep surf, and presently rose with his precious burden. It was not easy to gain the beach before the hut, but the dog swam vigorously and cautiously among the rocks, and at length reached the calm water and bore his charge to the dry shore, none the worse for her sudden plunge save by a thorough wetting and the loss of her hat. Christy seemed to notice that it was missing, and after looking intently out on the ocean for a moment, and discovering it as it mounted a distant wave, started after it with a loud bark. The hat went off farther, and the dog grew tired and weak, and had it not been for the timely notice of the sailors and the arrival of the boat to his assistance, must have sunk, a victim to his devotion. The girl, pale with anxiety on his behalf, beheld with joy as he was taken into the boat, and when soon after he sprang out upon the little beach and laid the dripping prize triumphantly at her feet, forgetful of her own situation and the strangers who followed him, she loaded her favorite with caresses, while they observed her with admiration.

She did not look up until she heard the voice of Father Mahan, who, advancing from behind the hut, and seeing the unwonted group on the beach and the agitation of his wet friends, drew near, alarm and surprise depicted in his face.

"How is this, my daughter? To what danger have you been exposed?"

The girl sprang up, and taking his hand, said:

"Nay, it is nothing. I only awkwardly tumbled off the crag, and Christy, the good fellow, leaped after me to save me from the effects of my carelessness. I dropped my hat as I went into the water, and Christy must needs go after it without my bidding, and if it had not been for the kindness of these strangers, I should never have had him again."

She paused abruptly and blushed as she noticed the observation of the men directed to her, and remembered the plight of her drenched and straitened curls and clinging garments.

But Father Mahan laid his hand upon her head and said: "Hasten, my child, to obtain dry clothing, and I, meanwhile, will talk with these men. A shower is approaching and we shall all be your guests, probably. I see that Joe and George are not come."

"No; they are lost in the fog, no doubt, and their boat can never outlive a great storm," said she, tearfully. "See how black the cloud is, and the waves swell and the fog rises and spreads."

"Think hopefully of all things, and forget not him who brings light out of darkness and changes our misgivings into great joy. We are in his hand. Hasten, my daughter," and waving the girl towards the hut, the priest turned to the strangers who waited his salutation.

The foremost of these was a young man not more than twenty years old, of medium stature, with a well-formed frame, an intellectual head, features denoting refinement and self-control, and a clear, steady blue eye that inspired immediate confidence. He was dressed in the garb of a sailor, and the extreme neatness of his attire, together with unusual fairness of complexion, indicated that he had not seen a protracted nautical service. He was accompanied by a half-blood Indian, who stood deferentially at a little distance leaning on the oar.

"Permit me to introduce myself," said the young man, addressing the priest in a cordial voice and polished accents. "Alexander Walsworth, a resident of the city of New York, and at present a transient visitor, with my mother, at St. Johns. We have come northward in the spirit of adventure, and would not return until we had somewhat explored your rugged shores and studied their wild beauty. The promising morning enticed me to undertake a lengthened coasting excursion to-day, but we were befogged at an early hour, were soon confused in regard to our course, and after continuous labor at the oars, have just succeeded only in emerging from the dense mist; and, had it not been for the zeal of your little friend whose energetic kindness has subjected her, unfortunately, to so great inconvenience, we should have fallen into farther trouble, for I knew nothing of the place, and Jake no more, since he has lived hitherto on the western coast of your island," and the speaker nodded to the Indian, who, upon being thus mentioned, bowed low to the priest.

"You have been guided to a safe harbor," was the reply, "where you must remain to-night, for you are many miles from St. Johns, and the storm-cloud comes up apace. This hut does not promise much entertainment to those accustomed to better fare," continued the priest, "but what is given is freely bestowed."

Walsworth interrupted him to deprecate apologies and to express his perfect content with the situation in which he found himself, and concluding, made some inquiries respecting the inhabitants of the place.

Father Mahan answered: "It is but little that I can do, either for the bodies or souls of my flock, but the Deity accepts our services according to the ability bestowed, and a small effort for our fellow-beings, wisely planned is often more truly beneficial than costly donations, and when a person sincerely desires to do good to others the opportunity is not long withheld. In the limited bounds of my parish, disappointment, need, sickness and other afflictions and abundant place, and I often spend the day in going from one scene of sorrow to another, until my heart is severely chastened and bowed down in sympathy with the suffering. The last deathbed which claimed my ministrations was almost a twelvemonth since, in this very hut—thank God I may call it the last and yet give it so remote a date. The stern angel whom we may not resist, has not come to us for so long, in either storm, pestilence or decay. But there was great affliction there when Betsy Parkiss died. For Joe, her husband, and George her only child, an impetuous, generous youth not far from your own age, though rude and hard in their exterior, have tender, loving hearts, great enough not to be ashamed of honorable grief."

"But," said Walsworth, with no affectation of interest, "does not this young girl whom I saw, belong to the family?"

"Yes," returned Father Mahan, "ever since her infancy; but she was not born here. She is a veritable 'child of the sea,' brought to us by the crested wave."

"And beautiful enough to be another Venus Marina; she is a miracle of loveliness," said the young man, earnestly.

There was a merry sparkle in Walsworth's eyes which was unobserved by the priest, as he demurely inquired: "And is what you have told me her whole story?"

"Thirteen years ago, Betsy Parkiss was one morning alone with her little boy, when she thought she heard signal guns. The fog, which so often broods over these waters, and distils such heavy sorrows for waiting hearts, densely hugged the shore, and she could see nothing, but without tarrying to confirm her suspicion of probable distress by listening if there might be a repetition of the indistinct sounds, she came directly for me, that our united efforts might in some way be of use. We waited long for any sound or sight of trouble; so long, we had begun to hope we had been needlessly alarmed, and went into the hut to take our repast, but had scarcely tasted our tea when George shouted after us vociferously. We hastened out, and gained the water's edge just as a stout sailor drifted to our feet, exhausted even unto death, yet embracing convulsively and holding above the waves a smiling infant. We vainly strove to resuscitate the unfortunate man from whom the breath of life was departing, and I buried him with my people, and Betsy took the child and nurtured it for her own. We learned afterwards that a packet-ship, missing her reckoning, had run upon the rocks concealed by the mist, and that only a few passengers had been rescued by a boat sent out by an England-bound vessel. We published the deliverance, but no one appeared to claim the child, and we inferred that all those interested in it met the watery destruction from which it was so providentially saved."

"And what did you call her?" said Walsworth.

"Though she has ever been a daughter to the fisherman and his wife, in affection and obedience, I thought it not best to bestow upon her their name, which has no history and makes no pretensions, and the child, as was denoted by its rich clothing and refinement of person that was early manifest, was of good birth. A golden cross, the token of a Christian faith, suspended from the babe's neck, was marked with the initial, 'V,' and accordingly, in association with the fancy that led me to call her sea-born, I christened her Vivian, for the Lady of the Lake, and this is the only name she has ever borne."

"And equally appropriate to her circumstances and beauty," said Walsworth, despite Father Mahan's frown. But changing the subject, he inquired: "Are you solicitous for the present safety of her foster father and brother?"

"They are in God's hand," said the priest reverentially, and anxiously looking from the darkening sky to the turgid ocean. "If they are not soon in this or some other harbor, their light boat will not preserve them from their fate. But we will hope for the best, for they are strong and know the shore. We must show no concern in the presence of Vivian, for since death has proved he has power over those whom she loves, she ever trembles for the safety of those who are spared. She will gain strength with years. I know the energy of her soul."

At this moment, the priest was nearly thrown down by a tumultuous summons from Christy, while his mistress stood smiling and beckoning in the hut door.

"A call to supper," said he; "come, my friends—yes, you too, Jake, we all sit at one table. Down, Christy."

"Stay a moment," returned Walsworth, "we are not destitute of provisions. Jake, bring along the hamper. We have ample defence against hunger, as we intended to touch the shore at frequent intervals, make such explorations as the country would permit, and take our repose and refreshment at any convenient spot by the way, but the fog caused our first stay to be protracted and laborious."

There never was a prouder housekeeper than Vivian as she welcomed her guests. In addition to the homely viands the cot afforded, Jake, obeying a signal from his master, relieved the hamper of its contents, taking out cold fowl and sandwiches and pasties and fanciful little cakes and wonders which she had never dreamed of; and when at last there came a bottle of wine and clinking glasses, and a bowl of transparent jelly and a jar of New York confections right down beside her plate, she nestled her little hand in her curls and shut her eyes that she might disabuse her thoughts of their notions of enchantment and force them to recognize reality in the astonishing display before her. It proved an animated meal. Suddenly a burning flash from the skies and a deafening peal brought them to their feet. The storm had burst over them in all its fury. The maddened waves roared in echo to the thunder crashing through the heavens, the lightnings quivered blinding in mid air, the rain fell to the earth in torrents, and the wailing wind filled up every momentary pause.

The little company looked on in silence and anxiety for those who might be exposed to its destructive rage. At length Christy sprang to the door with a bound; he listened, and then rushed out into the storm, barking furiously.

"It is a human cry!" exclaimed the priest. "May the pitying Saviour have mercy!"

At the same instant the dog vaulted into the room, and seizing the priest's garments in his teeth began to drag him towards the door.

"Yes, we will go," said he. "Do not be greatly alarmed, Vivian, and stay within, and remember the good Lord above, and how brave Christy is."

The calm, encouraging voice of Father Mahan reassured her somewhat, yet she trembled with apprehension as the lightning afforded her glimpses of the men who ran to the swollen ocean following the sagacious dog. She saw them standing at the end of the beach near the rocks, she saw Christy in the raging waves, then he was invisible, again she saw a dark object rising in the boiling surge, the men struggled to reach it, and next it lay upon the ground.

Christy's piteous, doleful howl fell on her ears like a knell. Icy cold she crouched in the corner and hid her face with her hands. She heard the men enter and remove the scattered articles that remained of their feast, heard them lay their heavy burden on the floor. It was not necessary Father Mahan should tell her Joe was dead. She knew it already, knew the good old man, that had been such a treasure of kindness and protection, was gone forever.

Quailing beneath the stunning blow of this sudden bereavement, Vivian for a long time had not courage to open her eyes upon the scene before her. But at last her desire to do something for George, whose voice she had heard, conquered the selfishness of her own sorrow, and she looked up. She was surprised to see him sitting just before her, for she had not been conscious of his approach, and when she saw the heartsick expression which subdued his usually animated countenance, and the deep tenderness of his gaze fixed on her, she could do no more than strive to behold him clearly through the gushing tears that veiled her eyes.

He extended his hand towards her; and she sprang up, and clasping his neck with her pliant arms, hid her face upon his breast.

"We are all alone, you and I," he said.

She answered by a burst of weeping. George brushed a tear from his cheek and presently continued: "I did my best to save him, Vivian, but the waves were too strong for me. But they could not drown him; they dashed us against the cliff and him they killed. If you were not in my arms now, I could wish they had done a double work, last year, and again to-night, and we alone are left, Vivian! I can live for you."

"Live for a greater and better One than any mortal, and you will never have to mourn the loss of your chiefest treasure," replied Father Mahan, in a solemn voice, as he drew near and lay a hand upon each bowed head before him, and then he offered a scarcely audible prayer, in which thanksgiving mingled with petitions.

"Come with me," said the priest, tenderly, when he had concluded his blessing; and he conducted them into a low room opening from a corner of the hut, where the corpse had been laid in preparation for the burial. Jake was watching by it in the dim light a flickering taper afforded, but he went out as they entered. The mourners stood long in reverent silence, which was finally broken by Father Mahan, who addressed them in words of solemn reflection.

George paid little heed to the salutary instructions of the worthy priest. Every sense was absorbed in watching Vivian, who, with a deep but now more peaceful sadness, leaned over his dead parent. The uncertain light scarcely reached farther than to illumine her features and her hair, so that her head stood out alone from the background of gloom. She looked a very angel bending in superhuman pity over suffering. George worshipped her with his whole soul. Clenching his hand and compressing his lips, he uttered: "There are no ties of blood that bind us, and therefore she shall only be more wholly mine. None other has any right to claim her, or shall take her from me. She must be mine, she is mine, and no might shall divide us."

What answering voice did that rash spirit hear which made its courage so quickly turn traitor, which made it recoil and sink in weakness from its own show of bravery? He gazed on Vivian for strength, but she floated far from him into the dim distance; he put his hands to his reeling head, but he could scarcely see her, and he reached forth in agony and fell lifeless to the ground.

It was evident to all that George, having stoutly refused every attention, had been too little cared for. Numerous contusions were found upon his head and shoulders, and the terrible struggles and exertion his late emergency had demanded, had so exhausted him it was long doubtful whether consciousness could be restored. But his vigorous constitution and the experienced skill of Father Mahan triumphed, and when the morning came, George was quite himself, only still pale and weak.

The succeeding day was devoted to the interment of the fisherman. It was now too late for Walsworth and the Indian to think of departing, accordingly they constructed a kind of tent of their blankets that they might have shelter for the night.

It was a lovely, peaceful evening. The atmosphere was clear and warm, and Walsworth, charmed with the scene, strayed away, seeking his own path over the gray cliffs. He at last came abruptly on a high and open place commanding a wide prospect of sea and land. Father Mahan was there before him.

"Look," said the priest, as he welcomed the young man, "behold the pitiless ocean, and see how it beams and blushes beneath the smiling sky, how it leaps and plays with the rainbow tints which flit over it. Thus even the tempest of the human heart may be quelled and peace ensue. Light ever succeeds darkness, and no path God opens before us is so difficult that it may not be pursued; hesitation takes the place of certainty when a true spirit seeks a knowledge of duty."

The young man offered his sympathy with boyish candor.

"Your affliction is great, and it will be long before you will learn to do without a friend who doubtless deserved your regard, but you, who have so often brought comfort to others, cannot be ignorant of its source when you yourself need it."

"I do not brood over sorrows," was the reply, "that merely concern myself, for I have long since learned to deem such of but little consequence; but I am troubled for those whose well-being is now my chief wish and responsibility—that noble youth and my beautiful sea-born child."

"It is not fit that she should remain here," remarked Walsworth.

"Most certainly not," returned the priest; "neither is it more suitable that I should take her home to myself. Many a poor family in my parish would share their last morsel with her, but she needs more now than food and raiment. She has a capable mind that craves nurture, and must I see it starve and deteriorate with only such teachings as I and her ocean mother can give her? Then, too, she has well nigh outgrown her girlhood, and needs a right-minded female friend to make her a true woman, more by example than by counsel. I see no spot for her near her old home, and though it is sore parting with her, I am nearly resolved to ask you to take her with you to St. Johns, where I have some worthy friends who would protect her."

Walsworth, with hearty cordiality, exclaimed: "I have a plan better than the one you propose; permit me to take her to New York."

"Think you I can let her pass from even my poor care to yours?" said Father Mahan, with a frown. "I mean no disrespect, nor do I insinuate distrust, but evil eyes and malicious words are everywhere ready in their pernicious work. They must not sully her."

"You forget that my mother is at St. Johns," replied Walsworth, "and I trust it is not improper for me to say she possesses judicious kindness of heart, and high cultivation, and is fully qualified to do for Vivian all you could desire. I make this proposal with the more readiness, as I know she has long desired to become interested in the training and education of some young girl who might in return be wholly devoted to her in affection and duty; but she has hitherto looked in vain for such an one. She is a widow and I am her only child. We are abundantly wealthy, and every material advantage is at our command for the profit of your young friend."

"A boy, with such an open face as yours, would never deceive an old man as much in earnest as I am," replied Father Mahan; and he added sorrowfully, "It is a long, long way to New York."

"What matters it," said Walsworth, "whether you are separated from Vivian by a score or hundreds of miles, if you know she is kindly cared for?"

"Nothing, nothing," said the priest, "she shall go with you unless I see reason to revoke my decision when we arrive at St. Johns. Stay with us another day, for she must have time for leave taking; and George, too, how can I find strength to separate them!"

It was curious the next day to see Vivian, when informed of the change designed for her, and knew it must be, urged by a painful restlessness that would not suffer her to pause, visit in turn, again and again, in and near the desolate area, which was as truly a loved home to her as if it had been the fairest scene which nature ever decked with lavish hand. The weather was still lovely, and as the evening drew on, Vivian went out upon the crag, whence the ocean could be viewed far and wide. Christy was by her as he had been all day, and George, who, weak and despondent, had lost the passionate resolution of the previous evening, was also with her. They sat on the rock and Vivian put her arm about the neck of her foster-brother and strove to cheer him. Long into the evening they sat there, he endeavoring to dissuade her from going, and she striving to pour comfort into his soul.

Vivian had never before been further from home than the poor little parish church just beyond the home of the priest, and if Father Mahan, George and Christy had not been in the boat with her, the novelty of unaccustomed shore and village would have been as uncomfortable as it was engrossing. She dreaded above all things, meeting Mrs. Walsworth; but that lady, a little surprised at first, only waited to hear a short explanation by her son, before giving her a kind welcome that went to the very heart of the orphan, and it quickly responded to the appeal Mrs. Walsworth made by her pleasing person and cultivated address. Still it was not easy to part with the friends of her infancy and childhood, and when at last they and the loved rocks faded from her sight, her heart beat with a wild pain that forbade her hope for happiness again.

Mrs. Walsworth was soon established with her family in her elegant home. To Vivian everything was as wonderful as a dream. The long halls lengthened by the subdued light, the spacious apartments with lofty ceilings and pictured walls, the richness of velvet and silk, of silver and china, the beauty of form and the loveliness of color, seemed a maze she never could fully understand.

Mrs. Walsworth, with the approval of Father Mahan, had adopted Vivian and thus bestowed upon her a surname, a distinguishing desideratum in her previous history. It was her intention to add to this all those educational, domestic and social privileges which were due to a daughter of the family. But she considerably permitted several weeks to pass before proposing any regular duties, that Vivian might become acquainted with her new manner of living, and she with the child.

Vivian soon found a friend in the housekeeper, an excellent lady, born to affluence, but by a succession of misfortunes reduced to penury, and deprived by death of the uncertain dependence on relatives. Mrs. Peyton was not too proud to receive assistance from her old friend and schoolmate, Mrs. Walsworth, if in consequence she need not sacrifice her independence, and accordingly accepted a position in her household, where she had much quiet and few cares. Vivian loved to hear her genial and instructive conversation, and see the chastened yet cheerful expression of her countenance; loved even the neat cap and soft dress, and this none the less because Mrs. Peyton had been pleased to admire Christy and to admit him to some domestic privileges. Mrs. Walsworth had a great many engagements, and thus Vivian often sought the housekeeper's room.

Of Walsworth she saw little. He had his various engagements, and after he had laid aside the simple dress, and the more careless manners of his northern tone, and demeaned himself to the conventionalism of city life, she stood quite in awe of him. He called her "sister," and brought her beautiful gifts, but she feared that she should never love him as she did her brother George. It was considered advisable that he should have for a while the immediate care of her literary education, and supply some of its marked deficiencies, before she should enter upon the regular routine of professed masters. With his special dislike of rudimentary drudgery, and the blunders of crude scholarship, this undertaking did not promise much that was agreeable, and he went one morning to find his new relative that he might ascertain where it would be necessary to commence in his instructions, with a sense of virtuous self-sacrifice which nearly amounted to heroism, and which was likely, should it grow with the continuance of his labors, to be an abundant solace and compensation for all the suffering that a sensitive taste would probably experience. He found Vivian in the library, and seating himself in a commodious arm-chair, he opened his intentions with a benignant countenance. She was very glad and very grateful, and as she stood near the window in her elegant silk morning dress and wondrous wealth of neat and glossy curls, she certainly looked much prettier than when she had just been borne dripping from the Atlantic. Walsworth thought so, at any rate, and he proposed his first question with a degree of interest that he had scarcely anticipated.

"You can read, of course," said he, encouragingly.

"O yes, and write too," replied Vivian.

"And perhaps you have studied one or two common branches—geography, for instance?"

"Yes. I went through Father Mahan's three times, till I knew it perfectly!"

"Arithmetic?"

"Yes. But I had an old and abridged copy, and it did not require much time."

"You know something of history, doubtless?" continued Walsworth, his heroism abated a little.

"No, not a great deal. I have only read one volume, and I have found a great many here," said Vivian, looking up at the handsome covers.

"Have you acquired any accomplishments, such as French?"

"I attempted it for a little while, and learned the verbs; but Father Mahan did not understand it very well, and we had no books and I gave it up as he advised, and then I had more time for my Latin," said Vivian.

"Latin! Have you been through the grammar?"

"O yes, several times, besides learning it in connection with reading."

"What have you read?"

"The only good Latin work which Father Mahan had was Virgil, and that I had read through once and was just commencing it again."

"Ahem!" and Walsworth began to walk up and down the room with precisely the air of a man who finds his calculations confounded.

"Well," said Walsworth, after a pause, "I am heartily glad you love to study. I will arrange a regular course for you, and you shall recite to me every morning. And more than that, we will plan a method of reading. Indeed, if you like poetry, I will read to you this morning. I delight in a good listener, above all!"

Vivian eagerly expressed her delight, and hastened to draw her chair nearer to Walsworth than she had ever dared to before. And he looked at her with an approving smile, and he read and forgot an appointment with half a dozen good friends, and read and talked upon many suggested topics, and made Vivian talk until dinner-time.

Walsworth instructed his sister through the winter till the warm weather came again. He was so interested in her improvement as to spend entire days for her benefit, guiding her through the magic world of literature, where she went joyously by his side. But best of all, he loved to take her out upon the busy streets, to see her little hand resting on his arm, and the tribute of admiring glances which his numerous acquaintances paid to her wonderful and unconscious beauty.

They were in the library one morning, and Mrs. Peyton, who used to sit with them often when she could not contrive any domestic employments, had gone out. Walsworth shut his book, and looking at Vivian, said with a very grave face:

"How pleasant it would be, if we could spend all our days just as we have the last half year!"

"And why may we not?" said Vivian, with an anxious expression.

"In the first place, I am going to Europe in a few weeks. I have used every argument to persuade mother to take you at this time, but she says you are neither old nor wise enough, and I am forced to accept her decision; and I shall be absent a year—perhaps two."

"But that is not forever," said Vivian, endeavoring to keep a steady smile on her lips; "and they will go away very fast if we do not think too much about them, and it will be only the pleasanter when you return with countless stories of your journeyings. We will lay books upon the shelf then; and we have yet the weeks before you go."

"No, we have not, for we are to have visitors from Alabama—Mrs. Laneton and her daughter, a young lady somewhat older than you. They are gay and social, and will make sad invasion on our old-fashioned quiet. You will like them, however, I think. I did at first."

"And do you not now?" inquired Vivian.

"O yes, certainly," said Walsworth, biting his lip; "but when persons are superficial in thought and feeling, they cannot command an intense and continued interest, for unless our regard is occasionally stimulated, it becomes apathetic."

"Well, never mind the present," said Vivian, trying to be cheerful. "When you return from Europe—"

"Yes, when I return," said Walsworth, gloomily; and brushing off the little hand on his shoulder, walked from the house, leaving Vivian to conjecture if she had said anything to offend him.

But she was not long undisturbed in her unpleasant contemplation, for Mrs. Peyton bustled into the room, announcing that the guests would arrive the next day, and sat down to enumerate the preparatory domestic changes necessary, and to systematize the housekeeping of the week.

"They are not like some other visitors," said Mrs. Peyton, apologizing for her excitement. "They keep the house in a constant stir when they are here, and if the servants were not well trained, would disconcert every arrangement. Mrs. Walsworth has reasons for requiring that they should receive the greatest attention. It is in part, I suppose, because they are used to it at home, for you must know that they are very rich—Miss Laneton being the heiress of about a million independent of her mother's property. But you cannot help liking them for a little while. However, I heartily pity any one who must spend a long life with them. It is desirable to have for your best friends those who are sincere and earnest—those who look upward sometimes—and therefore I am sorry for any one who is destined to live with persons not thus constituted." And looking full of sympathy for the case which she had supposed, Mrs. Peyton hurried away.

Vivian saw even less of the visitors than she had anticipated. As she had not yet "come out," she was not included in the crowd of invitations; and when there was a great dinner party at home, she entreated to be allowed to spend the evening by herself in the library. Miss Laneton laughed at her, and called her "an odd little chick," and after the company had arrived, privately sent her a bonbon.

Miss Laneton had much of the prettiness which is found everywhere; was agreeable, though unequal, being gracefully languid to-day and merrily sprightly to-morrow. She admired and patted Vivian, and occasionally invited her to her room, to show her dresses and ornaments which had just been sent home, to tell her the events of a soiree, and to talk about Walsworth, the only sensible and really satisfactory topic she ever introduced, as Vivian thought. Vivian was obliged to her for her good nature and well-meant kindness, but could not help thinking that the whole visit was an intrusion, coming as it did on the eve of Alex's departure, and when it would have been so pleasant to have had quiet meals and undisturbed evenings with only his mother and Mrs. Peyton, and she thought it was almost unpardonable in them to stay several days after he had sailed, when they all felt so sorrowful. But they went at last, and the French maids and extra servants; and Mrs. Walsworth, tired and nervous, resigned herself to the ministering tenderness of Vivian, and wondered how people could live in such excitement the year through. * * *

The second spring had arrived which marked the absence of Walsworth. During the two years, Vivian had been busied with masters, and studied with the single ambition to be approved of Walsworth when he should return. Mrs. Walsworth lived retired, and leaned more and more in affection and dependence upon her adopted child. Vivian used to read to her and Mrs. Peyton daily, and was deputed to reply to Alex's letters, the arrival of which were the bright events that gilded each separate month. Mrs. Walsworth permitted her to keep them, and perhaps it would be hardly fair in us to say how often she perused the hoarded treasures, or how endless were the missives sent in answer.

But with all her employments, she did not forget her Newfoundland home. George and Father Mahan were often in her thoughts. She often wondered if George would come to New York, and what he would think and say if he should see her; but then she hoped he would not come with the hope of her returning with him. But one May morning he arrived, looking so unchanged that she forgot the interval that had divided them, and welcomed him with kisses as she was wont to do in olden time, and listened with smiles and tears to the homely incidents of his own and Father Mahan's life, and how they never ceased to miss her.

"And now," said he, "I have done wonders at St. Johns. I have not had a loss, and as trim a vessel as you ever saw lies at the wharf here, and there is a tidy little room in it fitted up just as you would like, and I have come to take you home with me."

Vivian was troubled for a reply, and she stammered: "I thank you so much. I should love to sail with you on the Atlantic once more—to see Father Mahan—but—Mrs. Walsworth would never consent to my going."

"What if she does not?" retorted George, impatiently. "What right has she to interfere, if you wish to go?"

"I am indebted to her for such untold kindness!" said Vivian; "and if that were not enough to secure my deference to her will, I am her child, and she is my mother. Father Mahan gave me to her. Should not that be enough?"

"He had no business to do it without my consent," exclaimed George, fiercely.

"What could he do? She would not take me otherwise."

"I was ready to take you then, as now. O, Vivian, if you love me, as you said you did, go with me and be the light of my home."

"I do love you, George, but it would be hardly proper for me to go alone; if Mrs. Peyton would only consent to a voyage, I will endeavor to gain permission to return with you," replied Vivian, quite earnest in her wish to see the ocean again, and to contribute to the happiness of her foster-brother.

"Do you not understand me yet? Hasn't your heart told you what I mean? It is proper for husband and wife to go where they will, and, Vivian, I will shield you with such care! I will cover you from danger with my very life, if need be—and would they do more for you?"

Vivian started as if struck, and hid her face in her hands. She comprehended, at last, but how was it that she could not answer?—that she could see only the library as it was tenanted months before, and the precious casket of letters, and—O, Vivian!

George waited to hear her speak, and he turned deadly pale as he at length continued:

"Father Mahan told me not to come for you. But Vivian, look up—lay your hand on mine once more, that I may talk to you. Nay, put your arm about my neck once more. I will not hurt you—I am going soon. My brain has reeled ever since that dreadful night. The tempest got within my head and will not be driven forth." Vivian tried to calm him, but he interrupted her. "I can read your face better than you can tell me what is in your heart. You love me a little, but not enough to be my wife. It is something that I have seen you once more, and heard your voice. Give me your handkerchief. How like you it is! It has been in your hand—I will have it for my head." George kissed her and hastened away.

At that moment Mrs. Peyton, who had been out walking, entered the room. George stayed an instant for one searching glance into Vivian's face, but he read no encouragement there, and with a groan he rushed out. Vivian sprang after him in vain. She waited hours for him to return, confident he would not leave her thus abruptly. She told her kind friends about him, and they sent a servant to find his vessel; but it was gone, and George was never again seen in New York.

Long before Vivian could regain her usual spirit, Mrs. Laneton and her daughter came. There was another round of visits, and an inundation of shopmen and milliners and servants, but the ladies remained only a week, when they set sail for Europe, expecting to meet Walsworth in Paris and to return with him. Vivian had earnestly hoped that he would come home alone, and that they should have him the first few days without interruption. One day, when alone with Mrs. Peyton in her room, she said something of all this. Vivian was sewing, and Mrs. Peyton carefully observed her face, as she replied: "I thought, at first, either Mrs. Walsworth or Alex had told you, or that some one would tell you. I should have informed you, but he requested me not to mention the matter anywhere till the time came. I reckoned you would find it out through Miss Laneton in some way, but your eyes were shut, poor child. You ought to have known it."

"What?" said Vivian, afraid to hear the reply.

"Why, that Alex and Miss Laneton are engaged and are to be married soon after they arrive." Mrs. Peyton tried not to notice the effect her words had upon Vivian—her pallor, the trembling as she strove to continue her employment, but went on: "Alex was much taken with Miss Laneton when he met her a great while ago in one of his vacations. He was desperately in love, as boys are apt to be, and as there was no opposition on either side, and as the respectability of her family was such as to satisfy Mrs. Walsworth fully, the engagement was firmly entered upon. In a year or two, his fever abated very considerably. He had studied and travelled, and his spirit and intellect had developed greatly. Miss Laneton is one of those persons who never grow after they arrive at a certain point, just like an annual plant which shoots up thrifflily to a given elevation, and can go no farther. Alex saw his mistake. But he thought it was highly dishonorable to break an engagement. I could not make him see that it was not so bad as to fulfil it with reluctance, and so he resolved to sacrifice himself. His mother has no suspicion of his real sentiments, and you will respect his desire to hold them in concealment."

Vivian went from the room without speaking.

"Poor girl!" exclaimed Mrs. Peyton to herself. "I knew all that winter how it was going, and he is as much attached to her as she to him. But I could not say anything; it was not my duty to interfere; he must do as he will, but I hope Vivian will live through it."

We need not follow Vivian to her chamber, to read in her prostration and tears the agony and despair of her heart. Unaccustomed to analyze her affections, she had not known till this time the large devotion she had bestowed upon Walsworth. It was dreadful to learn her love and its hopelessness the self-same hour. It is pitiful, when the love of life is so crushed out of young hearts!

The days passed on, and Mrs. Walsworth observed that Vivian grew sad and wan, but Mrs. Peyton referred to George's visit and her regret for his trouble as the real occasion of her depression, and recommended a change of scene. A visitor luckily arrived at this juncture—Mrs. Raymond, accompanied by two interesting children still quite young. She was a native of Italy, and had in early life experienced great vicissitudes. She had arrived in New York a widow, and during several years was favorably known to Mrs. Walsworth, from whom she received much kindness. At length she won the regard of a wealthy Virginia gentleman, whom she married. In a few years she was again a widow, but contrived to reside in retirement upon her estate, only diversifying her time by occasional travel.

Business had brought her to New York, and for two or three days she was the guest of Mrs. Walsworth. She was greatly interested in Vivian, and never tired of watching her countenance when she could do so without rudeness. She noticed her paleness and languor, and recommended a journey, and substantiated her sincerity by inviting her to return with her to Virginia. Mrs. Walsworth determined to part with her daughter for a few weeks.

The residence of Mrs. Raymond was centrally situated in a rich valley, improved by high cultivation and skirted by picturesque mountains. Vivian had never seen nature before so beautifully displayed. Another agreeable novelty was the society of children. Little Florence and Albert were unusually interesting and sprightly. She loved them greatly, and often spent entire days in sports and story-telling for their entertainment. Mrs. Raymond was not only increasingly fascinated, but almost bewildered by the countenance, the air and the voice of Vivian, and repeatedly would exclaim: "How like him, my noble husband, in sunny Italy!" Vivian, on her part, loved Mrs. Raymond devotedly.

One warm afternoon, they were seated in the summer parlor. Little Florence clambered up on the couch beside Vivian, and began to play with her curls. Then the small fingers grew more daring, and took hold of the gold chain about her neck. It fell down concealed by her dress, and Florence sought to gratify her curiosity in as direct a way as her courage would permit, by saying: "Mama, what do you suppose Miss Walsworth has at the end of her chain? O, it's a heavy gold cross, with a 'V' on it; that's for Vivian. Why don't you wear it outside?"

Mrs. Raymond rose quickly, and after looking at the cross, exclaimed: "My child!" and fell senseless at the feet of Vivian. When she recovered, she begged Vivian to relate her history. Vivian had scarcely given the early incidents of her deliverance from the ocean and adoption into the fisherman's family, when she was interrupted by Mrs. Raymond.

"I am your own mother," said she. "When very young, I was united to your father, Alberto Verdi, in Italy the land of our nativity. You were born, and as Alberto and I were both orphans and destitute of immediate relatives, as we had sufficient property to afford a degree of independence without exertion, we resolved to come hither and devote ourselves to your education. As we neared the sterile coast where your infancy was passed, we were enveloped in a fatal mist—we struck—the vessel sunk—Alberto disappeared forever in the waves before my eyes—the boat which picked me up was too full to take him—you had been seized from my arms by a sailor, and my poor life was all that remained to me. I did not stay in England, whither the rescuing ship carried me, but quickly returned—hoping to find you. I employed an agent to make inquiries, but unsuccessfully. That little cross has enabled me to recognize you with certainty. It was given me by Alberto before our marriage, and I took it from my own neck and sportively put it upon yours, on the morning of that dreadful day.” Mrs. Raymond said much more, while Vivian clung to her with joy. The child, so long an orphan, was suddenly in possession of the richest earthly gift. She could scarcely sleep for many a night for the mysterious happiness that stirred her soul.

In a little while, Mrs. Raymond determined to visit the place which had been so long the home of Vivian. The season was already advanced, and the journey was commenced without delay. They were to sail from Philadelphia, and on their return stop at New York to explain everything to Mrs. Walsworth.

“I know she loves you dearly,” said Mrs. Raymond, “and will not willingly relinquish you, and certainly her kindness strongly establishes her claim upon you. I will endeavor to be reasonable, and will share your society with her.” Vivian made no reply. She could not hint even to her own mother the mournful secret of her heart.

After various changes, they reached St. Johns. Vivian anxiously made inquiries for George, and learned that he was at sea with his vessel, but was soon expected. The Indian, Jake, was fortunately at hand, and with another boatman readily consented to take the ladies to the parish of Father Mahan. Well stocked with provisions and other necessities, they started early one pleasant morning. The fog still lay about the shore, but Jake, experienced in detecting landmarks, warily pursued his course and brought his passengers in safety to the little estuary. Vivian hastened to the deserted hut, and was greatly surprised on seeing everything precisely as she had left it. Even a loaf of her bread, which she had made to leave with George, lay on the shelf where she put it, hard as a stone. Her aching heart found relief in tears, as she thought of the tender remembrance that appeared wheresoever she turned. Mrs. Raymond, with an interest and astonishment that can easily be imagined, examined everything, wondering how life could be supported where there were so few resources. Jake was immediately despatched for Father Mahan. Meantime Vivian found occupation in preparing a dinner precisely as she used to, so that when the priest arrived he seemed quite shocked on beholding the old aspect of things so suddenly revived, and Vivian, so little changed, tripping lightly about to serve him, but yet was so glad, that she wished she might always minister to his wants.

When the repast and much conversation was over, Mrs. Raymond laid down to rest, and Vivian and the priest went together out upon the crag. The mist had receded somewhat, and lay off the shore not a mile distant. The western sunlight fell upon the dense mass, and it glistened in silver sheen. To Vivian, it was indescribably beautiful. Suddenly they were aroused by the booming sound of a gun from the vicinity of the dense fog.

“What is that? Sorrow again upon the deep?”

They listened as another gun sounded faintly over the water. Father Mahan hastened to find Jake, but the Indian and his companion had strolled away, and it was an hour before the priest returned. The boat was however manned, and the men rowed out, but would not enter the fog. They kept their position near the obscure mass, and struck their oars into the water now and then to avoid drifting away.

We will forestall the communication afterwards made, and tell the fearful disaster which the treacherous mist occasioned and concealed. George, with one man, was guiding his pretty coasting vessel to St. Johns. He knew his course and went confidently, though he could scarcely see through the fog from prow to stern. In an instant, scarcely without a warning to his ear, another vessel came down upon him, and his own was directly sunk. He, with his fellow sailor, contrived to keep afloat and were taken up by the ship. But that was found to be fast filling with water and rapidly sinking. The panic was complete. George, almost alone in calmness of action, endeavored to direct the lowering of the boats. One at last put off from the ship so densely filled with passengers that it filled and sank. Another boat had meanwhile been lowered, and into it the ladies were put. Among them was the bride of Walsworth. Ere the boat pushed off, it was seized on by the despairing drowning ones, and upset. The ship was settling fearfully, and George and Walsworth could now only seek their own personal safety from destruction. Seizing hold of a floating spar, they labored to advance in the direction of the shore, till Walsworth was benumbed and exhausted. George, obliged to support him almost wholly, was himself now failing, when the fog broke before him. His burden was insensible, and he had already borne him an incredible distance through the sea; he grew powerless and thought he should never gain the shore. But the welcome sound of oars approached, and they were rescued. George sunk down on the bottom of the boat, where they had laid Walsworth. A strange curdling of the blood, an awful stillness, a fluttering, a creeping chill about his heart, foretokened death. He looked up to the sky, and with thoughts of the spiritual world above blended the earthly image of Vivian. Jake mentioned her name and told him she was waiting on the shore. George sprang up and sat erect. They were near the little beach. In a moment more, he stood beside her.

They carried the insensible Walsworth to the house. Vivian had not recognized him, in her delight on beholding George once more, nor had scarcely noticed that there was another with him. George led her a few steps, and sitting down, took her hand and laid it on his forehead, as he leaned against the rock.

"It is calm now," said he, "this troublous head of mine, beneath your touch! My vessel has gone down, but your room was unbroken, and I thought to close it, and it will be long before the sea-monsters enter it. When you go away, Vivian, take something of mine from the hut, that you may look at it and remember me."

"But I am coming to see you every year," said Vivian, "to do things for you and make you more cheerful and comfortable. Let me bring you some wine now, you look so very weary."

"Not just yet," said he, a beautiful smile playing about his lips. She knelt beside him and put back his wet hair and wiped his brow. "Vivian, did you ever long for any precious thing that seemed so hopeless you dared not pray for it? It was thus with me, just now, when I thought I might die and never see you again. Do not grieve for me when I am gone, but remember I was satisfied to die beside the great ocean with none but you—you and I alone. Speak to me, Vivian."

"O George, George!" exclaimed she, terror-stricken as she beheld the sudden change on his countenance. She bent to kiss his cheek, as if thus she would inspire him with new life. He raised his arm and clasped her tightly, and with her name upon his lips, died. In a moment she was unconscious.

Vivian was very ill after this. So sudden a shock, in addition to the successive excitements of the season, completely prostrated her. But the skilful care of Father Mahan, who had been her only physician from infancy, the presence of her mother and Walsworth, and the home-seeming which still attached itself to the blackened hut, were effectual restoratives, and in a little while she could think of returning. Before she went away, she took the flower-plants which grew in the garden—Walsworth assisted her—and placed them on George's grave. Father Mahan promised to cultivate and protect them for her, as her foster-brother had hitherto done.

She selected some familiar articles from the few possessions George had left behind him, and consigned the remainder to the priest. Mrs. Raymond left with the old man substantial tokens of her good wishes. Again Vivian visited each loved spot, and again departed with a sad heart, but not unsolaced by present blessings and pleasing anticipations.

The party arrived safely at New York. Mrs. Peyton was abundantly satisfied when she heard their various adventures recounted, and after she had held a protracted and interesting conversation with Mrs. Walsworth and Mrs. Raymond, neither of those ladies deemed it advisable to waste any words or good feeling in contesting for the possession of Vivian.

There was a wedding shortly after, and Vivian Walsworth went with her mother to Virginia, for a bridal tour, and they were so well pleased with their visit that they often repeated it during the happy years which succeeded.

Christy lived a long and dozy life in the city, and had his portrait taken by a skilful artist, which remained to be looked at and loved when he had grown weary of old age and had gone.

A SAILOR KING.

William IV., King of Great Britain, when at the age of fourteen, entered the British navy as a midshipman, performed the ordinary duties of his station, and went through the regular grades of promotion to a Post Captain. He served upwards of six years in the grade of midshipman, and performed in the whole, something like eleven years continued service, when he was raised from the grade of Post Captain to that of a Rear Admiral, and was about the same time created Duke of Clarence. It is seldom the son of a king has had the same chance of thorough discipline that William IV. enjoyed while an active member of the navy; and it is said that his manner partook in some measure of the roughness of a seaman.—N. O. Picayune.

Intelligent conversation is the great charm of man, the finest solace of intellectual labor, and the simplest yet most effectual and delightful mode of at once resting and invigorating the mind, whether wearied by study or depressed by struggles with fortune.

THE ALTAR AT HOME.

BY MRS. R. T. KLOCKER.

Dear, dear to our hearts is the altar at home,
 No shrine seems so sacred wherever we roam;
 For the dear ones knelt there that have gone home to rest,
 Then ask us not why it seems hallowed and blest.

We've knelt at the altar at the still starry hour,
 When a father's loved voice had a sweet, soothing power,
 When a mother's fond hand wiped away every tear,
 Then ask us not why 'tis held sacred and dear.

Together we'll kneel 'neath the fair azure skies,
 Nor blush for the tear-gems that moisten our eyes;
 We'll pledge to our Father where'er we may roam,
 That we ne'er will forget the dear altar at home.

When we kneel at this shrine so sacred and dear,
 Where the sweet vesper hymn fell low on the ear,
 Where the whispered "good-night," when the blessing was o'er,
 Once hallowed our childhood, we sigh no more.

THE BRIBERY.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

I WILL not mention the name of the town in which the following incidents occurred, for the Judge is still living there, and he may have reformed ere this. The town was on the Mississippi River, and at that time in its infancy; and it was infested by a band of reckless men who robbed and murdered when they could, and spent the rest of the working hours in gambling. Charles Masters moved into the place with his wife and family, and opened a store. He was a young man, not over thirty years of age, and possessed a firm, pure spirit, and a stout, kind heart. One of his first efforts, after becoming acquainted with the leading people of the place, was to rid the town of the miserable cut-throats who infested it; and to this end he pointed out their haunts, and endeavored to make the public officers do their duty. He had several of them arrested, but, though the proof of their guilt was as plain as the sun at unclouded noonday, yet he could not get one of them convicted.

At length it was determined among the gamblers that Charles Masters should be put out of the way, and three of their gang agreed to murder him. To this end they waylaid him as he was going to his house one night, and when he reached the place where they had concealed themselves, they rushed out upon him, and tried to stab him. But the young merchant proved too much for them. He had been warned of his danger, and he was prepared. He walked at night only with a double-barrelled pistol in each hand. On the present occasion, he shot down two of the assassins, and as he presented the pistol to the head of the third, he fled.

But the young man was not yet free. On the very next day he was apprehended for murder. At first, he only laughed at the idea; but ere long he found that there was something serious in it. The sheriff informed him that if he would leave the place, and never return to it again, he should be let off; but this Masters scorned to do. He demanded a trial; and he was informed that he should have it. The court was to sit in about two weeks, and until that time had expired he was confined in the jail. His wife and oldest child suffered much, but kind friends cared for them, and did all they could for their comfort.

The greatest difficulty Masters labored under was in finding a lawyer. The only lawyer of any eminence in the place had been retained on the other side. But in this fortune favored him most signally. Sargeant S. Prentiss chanced to pass through the town on his way to defend a man from the charge of murder in a distant town, and he promised to be on hand to defend Masters. He had known the young merchant, and his sympathies were at once awakened in his behalf.

The day of trial at length came on. The prosecution had strained every nerve, and as yet the defence had gained but very little testimony. No one had been present, save the prisoner and the principal witness, at the time the two men were shot, and no evidence could be obtained as to the evil habits of the two dead men; for, though many knew them, yet none dared to testify.

Prentiss came, and he called to see the prisoner.

"I see they mean to condemn you," remarked the lawyer, as he sat down upon the low pallet.

"Of course they do," returned Masters. "They fear me here; and those who do not fear me fear to testify for me, save to my own character. They dare not say one word against the desperate characters with whom we have to deal."

"Are you acquainted with old Nash, the judge," Prentiss asked.

"Somewhat," returned the prisoner; "and I think he is a hard man. I know he gambles much, and I fear he has an interest in some of the gaming-houses here."

"So I thought," said the counsel, with a meaning shake of the head. "But never mind," he added, "I will see what I can do to-night. Things do not look so dark as they might; nor yet so light as I wish they did. But keep up a good heart. You have friends about you, and I have some at work who are not suspected."

"Ah?" uttered Masters, interrogatively."

"Yes, sir," returned Prentiss, with a smile; "I have some perfect villains at work. One of your friends placed a thousand dollars in my hands, and I shall pay it all out to these very gamblers—that is, to such as suit me."

"But the thousand dollars, sir?"

"Has been raised by your friends. So rest easy on that score."

After chatting awhile longer upon various topics, Prentiss took his leave.

The court-house was filled with eager people. Charles Masters was in the prisoner's box, and old Nash was upon the judge's bench. This judge was a stout, heavily-framed man, somewhat over forty years of age, with a dark, lowering face, and dull, grey eyes. He looked more like some burly landlord than like a judge. He gazed wickedly upon the prisoner, when he entered; but his countenance changed when he saw that small, lame man come in. With the short, halting limp, and the regular tap of the heavy cane, Sargeant S. Prentiss entered the room. He took his seat close to the prisoner, and then cast his eyes over the scene.

First came the selecting of the jury.

"You may challenge whom you will," Prentiss whispered, "but it will make little difference. They won't present a disinterested man here, and I think you may as well accept the first one that is called. They will be all bribed—every one of them."

"Do you think so?" returned Masters, turning pale.

"I am sure of it. But don't let that trouble you."

At length twelve men were called up, and as Prentiss ran his eye over them, he understood the game at once. They were poor, miserable fellows—hangers-on about the different gaming-houses—and the court supposed they would every one be challenged, and in reserve were held the bold, reckless men who were to follow. The prisoner accepted the jury as it was presented, much to the astonishment of the spectators and the chagrin of the court.

Thus arranged, the trial proceeded. The indictment was read, and the prisoner pleaded not guilty. The prosecution opened the case, and then the witnesses were called up. When Nathan Knox took the stand the people were eager. He was the man who had made his escape after Masters had shot his two companions. He swore that he, and the two men who were now dead, had met the prisoner on the night in question, and that they stopped him and asked him what he would give them if they would put him in the way of clearing out some of the gaming-houses. He told them to get out of his way. This rather offended them, and they told him he had better keep civil if he knew when he was well off; and thereupon he drew a double-barrelled pistol and shot his two companions dead.

"Look ye, sir," uttered Prentiss, when he came to cross-examine this witness. "Now mind that you answer me truly, for if you speak one single falsehood to me you do it at your peril."

The fellow started at this, for there was something in the fire of those great, dark eyes of Prentiss that Mr. Knox was not used to. But he had no time for thought.

"Now why were you and your two companions concealed in that narrow passage?"

"We wan't concealed."

"What! Beware, sir! Not concealed? What do you mean by that? Why, my good man, you are giving the lie to all you have said. Now tell me why you went into that dark passage and staid there until the prisoner came along? Tell me!"

"We may have turned in there, sir; but we wan't hid. We just turned in to wait for the man to come up."

"And how long did you have to wait?"

"Not over half a minute."

"Be careful. May it not have been a minute? Remember, sir, a falsehood now will upset your whole testimony. You were seen!"

"Well, sir, 'twasn't over a minute, any way."

"Very well. And now which of you stepped out first when Mr. Masters came along?"

"Ned Hammond did."

"And you next, eh?"

"No, sir. Jack Nottell did."

"Now look ye, sir," thundered Prentiss, in that tone, and with that look which never failed to confound an evil mind, "you swore that you three were coming along the sidewalk, and that you met the prisoner—that you stopped, and he stopped. What did you mean by that?"

The witness stammered out some reply, but he could not clear himself from the snare he had got worked into. However, Prentiss let him go as soon as he had sufficiently shown him up; and the next witness was called.

When all was in of evidence on both sides, the case looked dark for the prisoner. Some few had testified to his good character; and some had even dared to testify to the fact that the gamblers had sworn to get rid of him on account of the exertions he had used against them. And the prisoner's own account of the affair was also received. The judge plainly intimated that the prisoner would be hung, and the jury winked at each other knowingly.

A lawyer named Compton summed up for the prosecution, and finally Prentiss arose, as was his right to do, to make his final answer. He reviewed a part of the testimony a second time, and then went over with the prisoner's own statement. He pointed to the wife and children of the young merchant, and drew a picture of such a man doing a foul murder. It was so preposterous that even the judge plainly showed by his looks that he didn't believe it. Prentiss saw that he had fastened the attention of both court and jury, and after dwelling a few moments longer on the picture he had drawn—after painting the youth struggling against such enemies as were arrayed against him, and seeking to rid his adopted home of the foul pest of the gambler's hell, he stopped, and raised his finger towards heaven. It rested there a moment, and then sank down again. The silence was breathless—painful—but it was not to last long. Prentiss raised those strange eyes of his to the judge, and the stout man quailed.

"Your honor," he resumed, in a tone so strange with marvellous power and depth that every breath was instinctively hushed when it came upon the still air, "I have one system of evidence which I have not used, and which may God grant I may not have to use. Of the perjury which has gone up, rank and reeking from yonder stand, I will not speak. But I will speak of a more deadly, damning thing which has crept into this house. I mean—Bribery! I hold at this moment in my possession evidence of the most wholesale bribery that I ever heard of. In all my intercourse at the bar I never came across a case which could equal this for gigantic, bold-faced, deadly bribery. Rake open the very bottomless pit, and drag therefrom the worst villains that an incensed God has consigned there, and they would shudder upon beholding the proofs of guilt which I could show them. I could show them an innocent man, compassed round about with evil, struggling for the salvation of his kind from Satan's fell grasp—that man shouldering the enmity of thieves, gamblers and assassins—waylaid by murderers on his way to his own quiet, peaceful home, and, to save his own life, obliged to shoot down two men whom you all knew for blood-thirsty villains. Then I should show them that man seized by his enemies, who were too cowardly to attack him physically again, and cast into prison upon the charge of murder. And—listen—I could show them now a fearful scene! I could point out to them those men who should save the innocent victim of all this wrong bartering away his life for a bribe! Ay; selling his very life to the meanest scum of this game-cursed place for a paltry bribe! In God's name hear me. Let not the story be told. As you value your sacred names here, and your immortal souls hereafter, let not the tale go forth. God forbid that I should herald the damning proofs! O, let me crush the burning, blighting evidence in my grasp ere another eye save mine, and that eye which never sleeps, can see it! Your honor, I have done. Gentlemen of the jury, I fear not to trust my client in your hands. I know the foul tempter which has whispered to you; ay, and which has dared to whisper to one higher than you, but I fear not his power over you. I can read the noble spirit in your faces now. I can see in each face before me a free and independent soul, and it seems to speak out—to speak plainly—thus: 'We are men—God keep us from temptation. We are jurors—no power can make us do wrong.'"

For some moments after Prentiss sat down all was still as death. It was not so much the words which had been spoken, as the tone, the spirit, the keen fire of the eye, the strange curl of the lip, and the significant pointing of that finger, which had moved the people there. The jury had at first been frightened, but the closing sentence of the address had placed them on better terms with themselves and with the speaker. They knew that he was aware of the bribery, but they now believed that he did not know they had accepted it. The judge was nervous and uneasy. He dared not meet the eye of Prentiss, and he hardly dared look up. His charge to the jury was all prepared, but he dared not read it. He had prepared it as the evidence was being given in, but he crushed it now in his hands.

But finally he arose, and after stammering awhile he simply informed the jury they had heard all the evidence, and that they might retire and make up a verdict. They went out, and were gone only some fifteen minutes; and when they returned they brought in a verdict of—Not Guilty!

There was a shout of joy went up from the people there assembled, though there were some low curses. The judge disappeared soon as possible, and the jury shrank away by a side door.

"Mr. Prentiss," asked the young merchant, as quite a party were assembled in the house of the latter in the evening, "what evidence had you obtained of this bribery?"

"None that would be good for anything in a court of justice," replied Prentiss. "I managed to gain considerable information on the subject by paying roundly for it, but I could not find a man who would give me his name, or consent to make oath. But I knew what that judge was made of; and so of the jury. I knew they had been bribed, and that your death was sure unless they could be frightened off. Of course they supposed my pockets were full of documentary proof. But it's all as well."

And so it was. A joyous evening stretched away into the night, and on the following morning Prentiss started for his home. This trial had put a ball in motion, and opened the eyes of the people, and ere another year rolled around the gamblers had departed and found new homes—some in other towns and cities of earth, and some—

ANECDOTE OF FRANKLIN.

When quite a youth Franklin went to London, entered a printing office, and inquired if he could get employment as a printer.

"Where are you from?" inquired the foreman.

"America," was the reply.

"Ah!" said the foreman, "from America! a lad from America seeking employment as a printer. Well, do you really understand the art of printing? Can you set type?"

Franklin stepped to one of the cases, and in a very brief space, set up the following passage from the first chapter of the Gospel by St. John.

"Nathaniel saith unto him, can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip saith unto him, come and see."

It was done so quick, so accurately, and contained a delicate reproof, so appropriate and powerful, that it at once gave him character and standing with all in the office.—Notes and Queries.

THE POP GUN PLANT.

In the mountains of Brazil there grows a set of very beautiful plants called Rhopalas; they are covered with velvet, especially on the young leaves, which are brown. There is a hot-house plant, Pilea callitrichoides, of tender, brittle and juicy aspect, which looks as if it would be good to eat in a cooling salad, but which is really of so explosive a temperament that it might fairly be call the pistol-plant. When near flowering, and with its tiny buds ready to open, if the plant is either dipped in water or abundantly watered, each bud will explode successively, keeping up a mimic Sebastopolitan bombardment, sending forth a puff of gunpowder smoke—or a little cloud of dusty pollen—as its stamens suddenly start forth to take their place and form a cross. It is an amusing toy, which produces a plentiful crop of pop guns.—Sat. Gazette.

Weak men often, from the very principle of their weakness, derive a certain susceptibility, delicacy, and taste, which render them, in those particulars, much superior to men of stronger and more consistent minds, who laugh at them.

HEALTH INSURANCE.

A thin, cadaverous-looking German, about fifty years of age, entered the office of a Health Insurance Company in Indiana, on the first day of May, 1856, says the Daily Courier, and inquired:

"Ish te man in vot inshures de people's helts?"

The agent politely answered, "I attend to that business, sir."

"Vell, I vants mine helts inshured; vot you charge?"

"Different prices," answered the agent; "from three to ten dollars a year; pay ten dollars a year, and you get ten dollars a week in case of sickness."

"Vell," said Mynheer, "I vants ten dollar vot."

The agent inquired the state of his health.

"Vell, I ish sick all the time. I'se shust out te bed too tree hours a tay, and te doctor says he can't do noting more good for me."

"If that's the state of your health," returned the agent, "we can't insure it. We only insure persons who are in good health."

At this Mynheer bristled up in great anger.

"You must tink I'se a pig fool; vot you tink I come pay you ten dollar for inshure my helts, ven I vos vell?"

GREECE OF THE PRESENT DAY.

The beautiful land of Greece, with all its glorious reminiscences, is now but the personification of fallen greatness. The Greece of ancient time, rich in its treasures of science, literature and art, famed for its agricultural and commercial wealth, is now no more, and in its stead, there is left a poor, oppressed, impoverished, and enfeebled country. Her government is one of the most inefficient and corrupt, with which a nation was ever cursed; and the people, robbed by the soldiery, and harassed by their rulers, cultivate the lands, only to satisfy the systematic exactions of their tyrants. In some parts of the kingdom, tired of laboring in the fields, for benefits which others will enjoy, many of the peasantry have formed themselves into bands of robbers, and infesting the public roads, live by the plunder of travellers; and if by chance there falls into their hands any hated official, he is sure to be visited with the full measure of their vengeance, in the form of tortures and a horrible death—unless, indeed, the chances of a heavy ransom are sufficient to induce them to forego the sweet delights of revenge. In all probability, the expulsion of the weak king Otho from his throne would be the greatest blessing that could be conferred on Greece.—Freeman's Journal.

A THOUGHT FOR YOUNG MEN.—No wreck is so shocking to behold as that of a dissolute young man. On the person of the debauchee or inebriate, infamy is written. How nature hangs labels over him to testify her distrust at the example! How she loosens all his joints, sends tremors along his muscles, and bends forward his frame!

Henrich Heine once remarked that the rich were too apt to think that authors and artists, like green fruit, were improved by lying upon straw.

THOU WILT COME NO MORE.

BY EUNICE EDSON.

No, no, thou wilt never come again;
Thine eyes so soft and clear,
That shone like violets after rain,
Will ne'er like violets open again,
Though other springs are here.

And we must miss thee everywhere;
Where'er our feet may tread,
A voice will come upon the air,
And speak of one once pure and fair,
Who now sleeps with the dead.

The moonlight through the clustering vines
Comes dancing on the floor;
The whip-poor-will with mournful song,
Makes music all the evening long
Beside our cottage door.

But thou, who, in our quiet home,
Once sat at close of day,
And watched the moon's pale, flickering light—
Whose soft voice mocked the bird of night—
Hast passed from earth away—

And we shall see thy face no more;
Seasons will onward flee—
The spring, with soft and genial breath,
Will wake the flowers from transient death:
Would it might wake thee.

JACK BRADLEY'S ADVENTURE.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

AT the time of the great fair, or "exposition," or whatever it may be called, at Paris, I happened to be mate of a packet ship sailing between New York and Havre. Being at the latter city when the excitement in consequence of the novel show was at the highest pitch, and constantly hearing people of all nations and kindred and tongues chanting its praises, I felt a very natural curiosity to behold the thing with mine own eyes, and judge whether Froggy's crystal palace and contents could compare with the similar plaything but a short time before constructed by their cousin Bull across the Channel. Accordingly, obtaining a week's leave of absence from the ship, I joined the immense concourse of pilgrims that thronged every road leading to the capital and in due course of time found myself in the great city.

Never having been at Paris before, I felt quite as much curiosity to become personally acquainted with the city itself, its palaces and its places of historical interest, as I did to view the more useful but less romantic products of the world's industry. So having satisfied my patriotism by going into ecstasies at sight of a bewitching Yankee reaper, and having fallen down and worshipped a most lovely and coquettish threshing machine, I determined to devote the rest of my time to walking about town and seeing the sights therein.

In pursuance of this plan, it chanced toward the close of a delightful afternoon, that I was sauntering carelessly along the Boulevards, without any definite object in view, except the general one of seeing all I could, and thereby getting as much as possible for my time and money; and there was plenty to be seen, you may be sure, on that gay and intensely French thoroughfare, with its throngs of well and ill dressed people, chattering, laughing and gesticulating as they sat upon the benches beneath the trees, or like myself lounged about the pleasant walks, with here and there a squad of soldiers off duty, a bevy of grisettes, lovers in pairs innumerable, bearded and turbaned Turks, pig-tailed Chinamen, English, Irish, Scotch, and French, mingled in Babel-like confusion, while in and out among the moving crowd glided the stout and watchful sergeants de ville with their swords and cocked hats, apparently seeing nothing, yet in reality observing everything, and ready on the instant to pounce upon any self-confident individual who might delude himself with the belief that he could with impunity fracture any of the laws of the empire.

Pacing slowly along until arriving at the corner of the Rue Richelieu, I stopped to gaze upon the endless stream of gay equipages that crowded the broad avenue. Every description of "drag" was there, from the unpretending hackney coach, to the gorgeous turn-out of a prince.

"Ah, that is all very pretty, and very nice, no doubt!" thought I to myself, with a little bit of a feeling of envy, as I gaped at the magnificent carriages and their no less magnificent occupants, the coachmen and footmen in livery; the silver-mounted harness, and the coat of arms upon the panels. "There you go, seated upon velvet cushions, with slap-up quadrupeds to cart you about; half a dozen flunkies to do your chores, and see that you don't fall overboard; no end of a fortune at your command, and probably a staggering title at the top of the heap; while here stand I, who, in my own opinion at least, am as good as the best of you, nothing but a poor, continually-to-be-sneezed-at Jack Nastyface. Well, well," I muttered, continuing my soliloquy, and endeavoring to call in the aid of philosophy, "there are compensations in life and nature. Now among all these fellows who are rolling in wealth, and bursting with greatness, there is not one in a hundred, no, not one in five thousand, and I'll bet my head against a sea cake that I'm right, who can reeve a Spanish burton, or even set a topmast studding-sail properly in any sort of a decent breeze. No, they do not have every blessing; while wealth and station are given them, knowledge and ability are given to chaps about my size;" and pleasing myself with such like consoling thoughts, I turned to retrace my steps, when I heard some one call my name.

"Joe! Joe Grummet," said a voice, which I fancied sounded rather familiar; but having stared about me a minute or so without seeing any one to father the voice, I concluded I must have fancied it altogether, and was upon the point of continuing my walk with that conviction, when a flashy carriage drew up by the side of the walk, and a gentleman leaning half out of the window invited me by word and gesture to enter.

Now I have always felt it as much my duty to respond to an advantageous "call" as if I were a parson; so returning the polite bow of the footman who opened the carriage door, I hopped in and seating myself comfortably, took a good look at the gentleman to ascertain what manner of man he might be, and having looked, was struck flat aback by the discovery that it was no other than my old shipmate Jack Bradley.

"Well, Joe, are you sleepy?" he asked, with a smile, as I sat gazing stupidly at him.

"No, not exactly sleepy," I replied, "but I may possibly be dreaming, and to make sure, I'd like to have you tell me whether this is really you, or somebody else? Take time to consider, I don't want you to answer unadvisedly."

"Upon mature consideration I am inclined to believe that you are correct in your conjecture that it is me and nobody else."

"That point being settled, where did you come from? how did you get here? whose cart is this, and what business have you and I in it?"

"To tell you where I came from, and how I came here, would be a long story, Joe; as for the rest, the cart, as you call it, belongs to me, bought and paid for, and you and I are taking a sail in it because we choose so to do."

"And the fat booby forward holding the tiller ropes, and the two lubbers behind with the plush breeches and gold lace, I suppose you've bought and paid for them too?"

"Yes, they, too, belong to me, body and clothes," he returned, with an air of satisfaction.

"Well, it's none of my business, Jack, how you came by so much flashy trumpery, so I won't ask the question; however, if you insist upon telling me, why, I'll try to listen."

Jack grinned, and telling the coachman to drive slowly, he began his story; but before we let him proceed, it may be as well to give the reader some insight into his early history, and the reason of my astonishment at finding him when and where I did.

At the commencement of my acquaintance with Jack Bradley, he was a brilliant and somewhat fast student at one of the most popular colleges of New England. An orphan, his pocket was kept in countenance by a wealthy relation, whose heir he had every reason to suppose he would be; but before his studies were half completed, the old gentleman saw fit to leave this world, which would have been all right enough, had he left a will too; but as he didn't, other heirs put forward their claims, and Jack was stripped of everything but his clothes and his debts, of which they could not find it in their hearts to deprive him. Soon after this unpleasant event, happening to run afoul of Jack in Boston, he gave me the history of his misfortunes, and asked my advice as to the easiest way for a young fellow who didn't know how to do anything, to obtain a livelihood and something more. Sailor-like, I advised him to make a virtue of necessity, come the patriotic and serve his country in a government ship. The idea struck him favorably, and before night we had him all rigged out in a blue shirt and a jacket of a thousand buttons. Having known each other on shore, we were naturally a good deal together on board the ship, I acting the part of a dry nurse towards him, showing him the ropes, putting him up to the moves, and teaching him what little of seamanship he ever knew. He was a lively, active, go-ahead chap, whom everybody liked, and I had no reason to suppose that he disliked the service or ever regretted having entered it.

In the course of the cruise we stopped at Marseilles, and our mess getting shore leave, we started for a night's drift through the city. Here, Jack somehow strayed away from the party, and though he was hunted after diligently, nothing was heard of him for some time and he was given up as a deserter, when, after the lapse of a week or ten days, he, to the surprise of every one, returned voluntarily to the ship, and with his clothes dreadfully soiled and nearly worn out, and himself apparently half starved. He would give no account of where he had been, or what he had been doing, but continued silent and thoughtful, saying little even to me.

Continuing our cruise, we passed up the Mediterranean, and it was several months before we again dropped our mud hooks at Marseilles; but no sooner did the opportunity offer than Jack was off again, and from that time I neither saw nor heard anything of him until we met so unexpectedly on the Boulevards of Paris, after an interval of half a dozen years. We will now let Jack go on with his story.

"You remember, Joe, the night of our arrival at Marseilles, that we went cruising about the town from one place to another until you might look two ways for the shortest cut to daylight."

"Which means, that we were out till midnight."

"Precisely, but you needn't put yourself to the trouble of interrupting me. Well, that species of amusement not being quite so much to my taste as it probably was to you old salts, I took the first opportunity to slip away unobserved, to have a quiet stroll by myself. Having pranced about the city an hour or so, it occurred to me that having for such a length of time slept only in a hammock, it would be a good idea to try how an old-fashioned bed would feel. So backing my mainpostail at the first public house I asked for a room, was shown one, peeled and went to bed; but going to bed was my share of a night's rest; sleep was out of the question. The noise of carriages in the street, and people moving about the house disturbed me, and when this gradually subsided, a most unlovely cur in the yard felt it his duty to set up a prolonged howl in a melancholy minor key, which elicited corresponding yelps from all the ill-conditioned pups in the neighborhood. This performance concluded, an unearthly screeching arose from the roofs of the outbuildings. Cat calling unto cat, and Tommy answering through night's misty shroud, back to the noisy whelps that called to him aloud, as Byron didn't say. There is nothing makes me more nervous than to lay in bed without the ability to sleep; and wild with anger I sprang from the bed, dove into my clothes, and out of the house with marvellous celerity. It was a warm starlight night, and being wholly indifferent as to the direction or extent of my ramble, I left the city behind me and walked slowly along the great road leading to Toulon. A walk of several miles brought me to a portion of the road, bordered on either side by large trees, rising from among the straggling undergrowth that covered the fields. Being somewhat fatigued I threw myself upon the grass, in a small clear space among the bushes, and almost immediately fell into a doze. Many minutes could not have elapsed ere I was aroused by the sound of voices near me. Cautiously and silently making an opening through the bushes, I obtained a distant view of the speakers. Four strong and muscular men, evidently belonging to the worst class of the lower orders of the Parisian population, were standing in the shadow of a tree talking in low and earnest tones.

"'I tell you the carriage will pass here in less than five minutes,' said one of the men, in reply to an expression of doubt from his companions.

"'Well then, since you are so sure of it, what do you propose to do, slit the old fellow's wind-pipe?' asked another of the group.

"'No, no, nothing of that kind,' responded the first speaker; 'we must try the other dodge. There was rather too much trouble about that last job, to make me anxious to do any more knife work at present. But look sharp, he's coming now, as I told you.'

"A distant rumbling of wheels betokened the approach of a carriage, and my respectable neighbors, each drawing a pistol from his pocket, awaited its coming.

"'Well, Jack Bradley,' said I to myself, 'here's a fine opening for a young man to distinguish himself as an amateur policeman.' But a moment's reflection convincing me that a discovery of my vicinity would in all probability result in an opening of a young man desirous of distinguishing himself as an amateur policeman by the thievishly inclined gentlemen before mentioned, I wisely kept quiet as possible.

The carriage, driven at a rapid rate, soon came abreast of my hiding place, when our friends made a simultaneous dash at the horses' heads, and with some little difficulty succeeded in stopping them. They were evidently experienced hands at the business, for in an incredibly short space of time they had the driver and the occupant of the carriage securely bound, their pockets rifled, and themselves tumbled together in a heap in the bottom of the vehicle. Then removing a small trunk or box, they turned the carriage in an opposite direction from whence it came, and hitting the horses several smart cuts with the whip, started them off at a dence of a pace.

"Now your story book, or theatrical sailer, upon finding himself similarly situated, would forthwith, and without a moment's hesitation, have sprang all unarmed as he was, into the midst of the four rascals, and with herculean strength laid about him with such good effect as in a few minutes to have seven of the eight villains stretched upon the ground, when a desperate combat would ensue between him and the leader of the sixteen discomfited desperadoes, who would of course turn out to be the renegade Count of Pizarretum, which discovery would raise the very old scratch with the sailer, and cause him to pitch in at such a rate as in less than two hours to completely vanquish the rascally count and spread him out by the side of the inanimate bodies of his thirty-two companions in crime, when the sailor, himself desperately wounded, would stagger a few steps, stop, drop the weapon from his hand, stagger a few more steps, stretch out his hands before him, gaze fixedly into the air, and murmuring in an awe-struck voice, 'Spirit of the wronged and sainted Adeliza, thou art avenged!' would fall smack upon the stiffening corpses of his sixty-four foemen and give up the ghost in a most charming and romantic manner to two bars of slow music.

"This," continued Jack, "would have been the proper course for a hero to pursue; but being no hero and nothing but a very ordinary Yankee sailor, I contented myself with snapping off a severe cud of tobacco, and waiting to see what would turn up next."

"Having listened to the sound of the carriage wheels till it died away in the distance, our robbers shouldered the box, with the contents of which they seemed to be pretty well acquainted, and passing my place of concealment so close as to give me a decidedly queerish feeling, kept on through the underbrush, whither I immediately followed, keeping at a safe distance you may be sure, being guided rather by the sound of their footsteps and the rustling of the bushes than by sight. In this way I tracked them for a distance of at least a mile, when they halted, and I came within an ace of betraying himself by not becoming aware of the fact until I was almost upon them. They did not perceive me, however; so creeping stealthily along, I was enabled to secrete myself in a clump of bushes but a few feet from them, where I could observe all their motions and overhear all that was said. The spot where they stopped was a small, clear space of perhaps twenty square yards, among the bushes, covered with dried grass and leaves, and presenting no appearance of having been disturbed by man for years; but a few minutes of hurried labor on their part disclosed the fact that it was the locality of a cache, or place for burying their ill-gotten treasures. The dried leaves being carefully removed and a large flat stone raised from its place, the fellow who appeared to be the master spirit of the gang, proceeded to pick the lock of the lately stolen trunk.

"Now then, boys," said he, when this was accomplished, 'shell out whatever you took from the old cove; we want nothing about our persons to identify us with this night's job, and the stuff will be all the better for being salted down for a few months.'

"The fellows hereupon emptied their pockets of a variety of jewelry, which the leader deposited in the box, and taking from among a considerable number of similar ones a rouleau of gold coin, he distributed it among them. The box was now placed within the cavity in the earth, the stone replaced, and the dried leaves scattered over the spot so as to obliterate any trace of the surface having been disturbed.

"All being arranged to their satisfaction, they proceeded to take themselves off, but instead of retreating by the way they came, they advanced directly toward my hiding place. Now if I was merely spinning a yarn for amusement, I should probably say that, petrified by a sense of danger, I remained rooted to the ground. But such was not the case. Dropping upon all fours I rooted my way among the bushes in a decidedly hoggish manner, and with much celerity as that style of locomotion would admit. The robbers kept close to my trail for some minutes, and I must have squirmed along several hundred yards before they finally passed me and I felt it prudent to resume my position in society as an upright man; and having done so, I was at no little loss to decide what steps to pursue next. In this dilemma I very naturally continued to take steps straight ahead until I reached the road, where I stopped to deliberate. My first impulse was to hunt you up, and get your advice upon the matter; and as first impressions, they say, go a good way, my first impression of what was proper went as far as Marseilles, and took me along with it.

"Day was breaking when I reached the city, and as I spanked along the street toward the villainous locality in which you delighted to pass your time, my attention was attracted toward a crowd of persons where there appeared to be a scuffle going on. Thinking there might be a free fight, and having no objections to taking the kinks out of my arms by indulging in a few rounds, I mixed with the crowd.

"What's up?" I inquired of a seedy individual near me; whereupon he proceeded with all the loquacity of a Frenchman, to inform me as to the particulars of the robbery to which I had been a witness, and furthermore that the occupants of the carriage having found means to release themselves from the confinement in which the robbers placed them, had forthwith returned and given the alarm; that the police had turned out in force, guarding every avenue to the city, and had just succeeded in arresting four men whom the coachman identified as the thieves, although none of the stolen property had been found upon them.

"I was just upon the point of betraying my knowledge of the affair, when one of your off-peated lessons to me, how to keep out of difficulty on board ship occurred to me, to wit, that profound ignorance was profound safety, and that if I would keep myself clear of a great deal of other people's trouble which would become my own by interference, and no thanks for it either, I must be a fool upon all occasions, and not be induced to know anything at any price. " 'What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander,' thinks I to myself, and if Joe Grummet's advice is good at sea, it must be particularly bunkum in Marseilles; so, extricating myself from the crowd, I crowded sail for the place where I had seen you the night before, but to my disappointment I found that you with the rest of the boys had already gone on board the ship. I had little inclination to do likewise, for I could not help thinking of that celebrated 'tide in the affairs of men,' and fancying the cache among the bushes to be, if not high water mark itself, at all events, pretty near it.

"Accordingly, fortifying myself with three or four breakfasts—for I was hungry as a Roman Catholic shark in the middle of Lent, I stowed away a cubic foot of cold ham, with bread in proportion in my pockets, and started back to the scene of my last night's adventure. I made no doubt of being able to go straight to the spot; but in this I was disappointed. It had been too dark on my first visit to enable me to distinguish any prominent objects, and as I had left in such a hurry, I had not thought to make any marks by which to be guided. The clear space among the bushes I found to be by no means unique, there being many thousand similar spots scattered for miles over the fields, and in every particular as like two thieves to the real place.

"All that day I hunted, and passed the night beneath the trees. The next and the next day's search was equally fruitless, while in the mean time, my scanty supply of money was rapidly absorbed by the commissariat department; so that at the close of the tenth day's search I found myself half starved, out of money, grub and patience. There was nothing for it but to return to the ship, which I did, sulky as a bear, as you remember. It didn't strike me that there was any necessity of taking a speaking trumpet and announcing my adventure to all the world, so I kept my own counsel, and whatever stray articles of value I could lay my hands on, to enable me to fly my kite for another search at some future period.

"The months that elapsed ere we again touched at Marseilles, were the longest I ever passed; it seemed to me like so many years. I could neither think nor dream of anything else beside Monte Christo and his countless millions, and imagine myself in a like predicament. At length, to my inexpressible joy, we received orders to up stick for the haven where I would be. My shore liberty was of course stopped on account of my previous desertion, but a few shillings to the marine on guard on the fore-castle, rendered the unfortunate man perfectly blind, so that I found no difficulty in slipping over the bow and swimming to the shore, the very first night of our arrival.

"Once more on good dry land, I felt worth a dozen sailors, and forthwith directed my steps toward the haunts of the web-footed, where the information I desired could most readily be obtained.

"Upon inquiry I learned that the four robbers had been sent to the hulks, every man of them—but that none of the stolen property had been recovered, notwithstanding extraordinary inducements had been held out to the prisoners to disclose where it might be found, not so much for the amount of money lost, as for very important papers which the box contained; but the scamps refused to divulge with a pertinacity for which people found it difficult to account, but which I very well understood, as upon the memorable night of the robbery, I had seen that their cache contained very much more than that one box, the discovery of which would have probably consigned them to the gallows.

"I also learned that the person who had been robbed—an old gentleman—had received such a shock from fright, that for several weeks he continued in an almost insensible condition, when he died, leaving a large estate with two claimants. One, a Mademoiselle Marie Le Marie, a young girl whom he had publicly acknowledged as his heir, and the other a roystering young fellow, a sort of nephew of two removes, who would in all probability obtain the estate in the absence of the old gentleman's will, which was supposed to have been in the stolen box.

"This was quite as much as I cared to know; so quitting the city as speedily as possible, to avoid falling in with any of our ship's company, I renewed my search for the artificial gold mine. For several days my search was wholly unsuccessful, but at length, when almost ready to give it up in despair, I stumbled upon the place by the merest accident. I cannot give you the particulars of how I felt and what I did upon the occasion, for I don't know myself, I was in such a state of excitement. I only know that upon disinterring the precious remains I found in various packages—evidently the spoils of many robberies—gold coin to the amount of several thousand dollars. Transferring a moderate sufficiency to my pockets, I returned the rest to its hiding place and fell to work examining the papers, of which there were quite a number. Almost the first one I opened proved to be a will signed by a Monsieur Le Marle in favor of Mademoiselle Marie; the rest were title deeds of one thing and another, the examination of which I put off to a more convenient season. Pocketing the papers, I returned to the city, invested a portion of my capital in a suit of exquisite Parisian garments, visited a barber, and had myself beautified, and the grand plan of a pair of moustaches staked out under my nose, and set out to hunt up Mademoiselle Marie Le Marle.

"In this I did not experience much difficulty, for her youth, her beauty, and her misfortunes made her pretty well known; but in going to her residence I had a narrow escape from being captured by a party of our ship's officers that I met on the street, who knew me despite my change of dress, and from whom I escaped only after a long chase. Mademoiselle Marie I found to be an uncommonly smooth-looking little lady, with whom almost any young chap would find it extremely difficult to avoid falling in love right off. I stated my business at once. She was first surprised, then pleased, then overjoyed, and then she cried into a handkerchief for half an hour.

"Upon my inquiring what steps she intended to pursue in regard to the will, and other papers, she said she didn't know, that the lawyer her uncle had always employed had been retained by the other claimant to the estate, that none of her relations had offered their assistance since it became probable the will would not be found, and, in short, that she didn't know who to apply to.

"I offered to devote myself to her service until her business was arranged. The offer was joyfully accepted. The fact of my returning her the papers at all, she said, was sufficient guarantee of my honesty of purpose. I informed her that, to accomplish the business, it would be necessary for her to accompany me to Paris. She hesitated, and finally agreed to go if Fidele—a terrible old fright—could go with her. I consented, of course. We went to Paris, we went together, we were a good deal together for three months, after our arrival in Paris, at the end of which period she was put in undisputed possession of a mighty nice little property. All I had promised to do having been accomplished, I called upon Marie one evening to take my leave of her. She was in a very lively mood. I told her I was about to leave Paris, at which announcement she began attentively examining the pattern of her apron. I further informed her that I expected to leave the next morning; she became absorbed in the contemplation of the toes of her boots, I took her hand and said good-by; she—

"Halloa, here we are at home," said Jack, as the carriage drew up at the door of an aristocratic-looking house. "As you are going to stop here with me during the remainder of your stay in Paris, I shall let my wife tell you the rest of the story."

ANECDOTE OF A PARROT.

I must not fail to relate, for the amusement of your fair readers, a little story which, although very simple in itself, affords matter to laugh at. In one of the windows in an apartment situated on the much crowded and fashionable walking place called le Boulevard des Italiens, a most wicked parrot hides himself behind some curtains, haranguing all the passers-by. This bird is in the habit of calling out the whole day long the name of "Edward, Edward," in quick succession. Thousands of persons are passing the spot at every moment of the day, and up to a late hour in the evening, and as it so happens that amongst a hundred passers-by, some ten bear the name of Edward, all the Edwards walking past the spot look suddenly up to the house, exclaiming "hein?" It suffices that one single person looks in a surprised manner up to some particular point to create an assembly of inquisitive persons. The parrot again calls out "Edward, Edward;" meanwhile a dozen new Edwards have arrived at the spot, where they find themselves called by their name, and the crowd bursts out in a great laughter at the expense of the teased Edwards. I have never known a humorist of greater imperturbability than this parrot is. Not all the parrots are humorists, but many a humorist is nothing else than such an involuntary comical parrot.—Paris Correspondence.

LOCO FOCO MATCHES.

These useful household conveniences were first introduced to the public in 1836. An exchange, speaking of the match trade, says: A. O. Phillips, of Springfield, Massachusetts, was the first person who took out a patent for their manufacture. The composition is a preparation of chalk, phosphorus and glue, and is made as follows:—An ounce of glue is dissolved in warm water; to this is added four ounces of fine pulverized chalk, and stirred until it forms into thick paste. One ounce of phosphorus is then added, and the whole are well incorporated together. Into this the ends of the matches—which have been previously coated with sulphur and dried—are dipped, and then laid in rows on slips of paper, cut wide enough to lap over the ends of the matches. One of the largest Loco Foco match factories in this country is located in Troy. It makes about $1000 worth a week.—Albany Atlas.

Receive your thoughts as guests, and treat your desires like children.

TO MY LITTLE FRIEND.

BY ROBERT R. MCRAE.

Singing gaily where thou may,
Full of life and full of play;
Full of joy and full of glee,
What's this world of care to thee?

What's its many scenes of woe,
Thou too young for them to know;
Life to thee now bright appears,
In this world of many tears.

On thy face there rests a smile,
Pure and free from earthly guile;
Round thee friends do clustering come,
To shield their little darling one.

Singing gaily where thou may,
Pass life's hours with joy away;
And if troubles thou shouldst meet,
May they part before thy feet.

Flowers bright I trust will spread
Where thou may be wandering led;
And life's river here below,
Softly, "Addle," for thee flow.

Oft I think of days gone here,
When by me thy form was near;
And thy love thou there did show,
By the kiss thou 'ld pure bestow.

But they've passed—those days are gone,
Bright ones then, for which I mourn;
Hearts who then "bright hope" they bore,
Now lay crushed with hope no more.

THAT SEMI-ANNUAL ACCOUNT.

BY MRS. E. WELLMONT.

To have a bill thrust in our hands which we were not conscious of owing, generally makes a man savage to more than one. In the first place, he wonders at the audacity of the collector who presents it; and in the next place, he vents his indignation upon the contractor. The poor misguided wife, who in an evil hour was decoyed by the flattering vender of silks and gossamer and laces to "open an account" with the feeling that a thousand unforeseen occurrences may make the payment easy before a whole half year has passed away, and who feels the absolute importance of dressing her children as other young ladies are clothed, thinking thereby somebody's attention may be caught by the "fine feathers," and well knowing it will save a perpetual teasing for the articles she has just purchased, puts off the pay-day without many sleepless nights until she is amazed that July has come along so suddenly.

That fierce ring at the door has been answered by herself, and Mr. Tasewell only cast a furtive glance towards her, as she took the yellow envelope and immediately proceeded up stairs. He then cast his eyes again towards his newspaper, but not to read it. Mrs. Tasewell is his second wife. He has been very well satisfied with his connection with her, but those unfortunate daughters that he married too, he did not covenant to support, and but for these, his home would be a happy one. He is sometimes a little jealous at the private manœuvring which is carried on in the spare chamber; he has seen splendid dresses slipped suddenly into the wardrobe just as he entered the room, and he has been puzzled to know how his wife expended all her pin money. The young ladies have been teachers in private families, but since their mother married into so "good a home," one of them has become delicate and cannot bear the drudgery, while the other is waiting a chance to go south, where salaries are more remunerative.

Poor Mr. Tasewell! He had no children by his first wife, and the very thought that everywhere and in all places he is for the first time called "father," now he is past his prime, always makes him uneasy. It seems to him the appellation was never so freely used by any family toward the genuine parent. And then they are so affectionate! Just as he was playing the rubber game with his old bachelor friend, Mr. Pitt, the other evening, Miss Sophronia approached him and accompanied her good night with such a violent kiss, that it made the old gentleman really inquire "what's trumps?"

Sometimes Mr. Tasewell sits and muses why he got married the second time; but then he calls to mind the necessary appendage of a wife who is interested to save his effects from destruction, and he remembers what losses he encountered during his six months' widowship, when all his drawers were left empty by that "well recommended housekeeper," who complained with two servants to help her along, and how fast groceries seemed to evaporate—sugar and butter disappearing strangely, the bag of coffee lightened very perceptibly in a week's time, and the chest of tea diminished full one half—besides the running account over the way being double that of any previous months in housekeeping. And then when he told his trials to his intimate friends, the reply always came: "Well, you must get you a good wife to superintend these things!"

Now Mr. Tasewell had a mortal aversion to making love or following the course of a long courtship. When he decided whom to marry, he should do so, and his friends all corresponded in recommending the widow Elsie Tufts as a suitable person for number two. The widow had not much property—a small farm upon which was a house, a barn and a vegetable garden; the rest was neither tillage, pasturage nor mowing land, simply because it was all run out.

Mr. Tasewell was a retired city grocer. He had failed twice in his life, but closed up with honorable discharges, and was now reckoned by the assessors to be worth about thirty thousand, although he paid taxes for but fifteen of it. But what he called his own, he always felt a disposition to keep; he never expected that the Tufts children in speaking of his property, would call it "ours." Still, as he must have a wife for reasons assigned, he called upon the widow and inquired of her how she should like to live near the great city.

She did not hesitate long, but she wiped the corner of one eye, and spoke of "poor Mr. Tufts as having been such a good husband, that it would require an indulgent person to fill his place. Still, it was so difficult for a widow to manage her affairs alone, and everybody took advantage of ladies in her position, yet she must say"—and she stammered a little here—"that—she—had a proposition already under consideration, but—" and here she ended.

Mr. Tasewell went back and thought it all over at home. The widow Tufts was well looking, of a fair reputation, had no incumbrances, as her children supported themselves and paid their board when at home; she could let her farm for enough for her own pocket money, and with her stock of housekeeping articles, added to those which remained to him, he thought on the whole the next Sabbath he would spend with her.

Mr. Tasewell was no beau. He dressed just above being shabby, and never owed a tailor's bill in his life; but now before starting on this expedition, he appeared in a new suit, and being well cropped and trimmed and dyed at the barber's, he really was a well conditioned man. But still he knew not his competitor, and in fact never did. In one fortnight from that time, there was no widow Tufts. The young ladies at once fell into the habit of calling "father," and they were so fond of him that all at once they both took a vacation which seemed not likely to terminate.

Mr. Tasewell was in the third year of his second marriage. The daughters had two successive seasons carried him to watering places, and now a journey to the White Hills was projected; and just as it was about being consummated, the unlucky semi-annual bill was presented for payment. This incident gave Mrs. Tasewell a fit of the blues, which for want of knowing the cause of the disease, the step-father interpreted as a letter from some old lover whose position was so eligible that he was wout to tease one who refused him. Surely Mr. Tasewell was a very jealous man! Yet the more he pondered, the more certain grew the fact. He refused to take the journey; he grew sullen and morose, sat much alone, was gone nearly all day, and was dispirited when he returned. His wife, too, saw the improbability of being able to pay the bill which so vexed her, and the collector had called for the third time.

The daughters were aroused by this state of things again to return to their old avocations, and discharge the debt which was incurred solely on their account. The event proved so happy in its termination, that we were induced to tell the story for the benefit of any who may have settled upon their step-fathers without an invitation, merely to become "pets." Long before the bill was paid, Mrs. Tasewell had relieved her husband of his jealousy by informing him of the cause of her unhappiness, and it is needless to add that the step-father at once liquidated the debt, assuming the young ladies for his paymasters. The old couple now walk, ride, chat and enjoy each other's society with the greatest freedom; the girls are welcomed home to spend their vacations, but they will never fail to remember that their father married the widow Tufts, and not her two daughters.

This remembrance is likely to operate well for them. In one of those hot days when nearly all business is suspended, Mr. Tasewell called upon his attorney to draft his will from dictation. The legal gentleman being a bachelor, has since become introduced to Miss Sophronia, and we may as well close by adding, "straws tell which way the wind blows."

ECHO ANSWERING.

What must be done to conduct a newspaper right?—"Write."

What is necessary for a farmer to assist him?—"System."

What would give a blind man the greatest delight?—"Light."

What is the best counsel given by a justice of the peace?—"Peace."

Who commits the greatest abominations?—"Nations."

What cry is the greatest terrifier?—"Fire."

What are some women's chief exercise?—"Sighs."—Christian Freeman.

The threshold of life is known by there being the number 21 on the door. Knock boldly—hold your head up—and enter "like a man."

A HARVEST HYMN.

BY J. M. FLETCHER.

The yellow fruit, the mellow fruit
Is dropping from the trees,
The golden grain on hill and plain
Is waving in the breeze.
Then cheerily and merrily
The harvesting begin,
And reap the field and store the yield,
Till all is gathered in.

The God above, the God of love,
Has smiled upon the year,
And everywhere the earth and air
Are vocal with the cheer;
Then carefully and prayerfully
The harvesting pursue;
Nor fail to raise a hymn of praise
To whom the praise is due.

The chilling air, the killing air
Of winter soon will blow,
But little need the farmer heed
The storms of rain and snow;
For costily and proelily
Before the cheerful blaze,
With plenty crowned and friends around,
He'll pass the winter days.

THE IMPERIAL KEYS.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

In the year of our Lord 249, Philip the Arabian was Emperor of Rome; an arbitrary man of great learning and a foreigner. Hated by the people, and in turn hating them, his administration was attended by myriad difficulties, and no one wondered when a rumor flew thousand-tongued through the city, that the immense army on the northern frontier had revolted.

"I have awaited it long," cried one of the Plebs to another, on the Capitoline Hill, "and Decius is to be sent to them!"

"Decius? How know you?" eagerly interrogated a tall, stately woman, closely veiled, who was passing at the moment.

The man shrugged his shoulders.

"Per Jove! By my learning, good woman!" but his interrogator had already left him, and was sweeping swiftly down the Sacra Via. Crossing the forum with a light but commanding step, she stopped before the amphitheatre a moment, where two men were leading a royal Bengal tiger in chains, and heavy with narcotics, towards his claustrum.

"On whom is he to fatten?" asked she, of the keepers.

"On whom the emperor wills," said the first.

"That is," added the other, "to starve. For neither gladiators nor Christians shall we see torn up this two months; and he and his fellow, a Nubian lion, that would make your mouth water, may lose their claws in ease, for aught he careth."

"Christians?" asked she, "anything that way?"

The drowsy beast slowly turned his green, cavernous eyes upon her.

"Less asked, less known. Yet they do say, that Vitellius," and he looked up, keenly, "is preparing us some work." But the woman was gone ere he finished.

"A Christian herself! I'll warrant her!" the other added.

"Not she. It is Marina, thou clod! who was, last ideo, the emperor's wife."

Meanwhile Marina went on her way, and finally disappeared beneath the peristyle, and within the arch of the palace on the Palatine. Sweeping aside a heavy curtain, she came at last to a large apartment opening on the inner court, and whose tessellated pavement was kept always cool by shade, and whose air, by a fountain, that, dashing aloft through a far dome, iced the temperature of the upper apartments. Lying on the pavement, pillowed only by her white arm, lay another woman, younger, perhaps, and fairer than Marina, for unveiling herself, the other displayed eyes, large, black and hollow; cheeks, from which a fortnight's trouble had rubbed the bloom and roundness; lips, pale and bleeding, where she had slightly torn them with her teeth. Her black hair was coiled around her head and fastened by a silver arrow, and her tall figure was almost disproportionately round and slender, as she bent above the sleeper. The golden hair of the latter, broken from its gemmed netting, streamed in curls over the black squares of the pavement, her thin, white garments showed the symmetry of her limbs. Not so tall as Marina, she still might have been above the medium size. Her lips, parted above pearls, were crimson, and a soft flush of health glowed on the cheek just touched by long, brown lashes. From her hand a scroll had fallen. Marina took it up; it was the gospels in Greek.

"As I expected," murmured she; "the book I gave her, foul wretch of a Christian! But I have brought her to it. I have sealed her fate! and she the daughter of Vitellius, high priest of Jupiter. I could destroy her!" and she looked it. But the next moment changing her manner, as the sleeper opened a pair of hazel eyes: "News, dearest!" she whispered; "guess, Valeria, what it may be."

The daughter of the high priest rose, and concealing the scroll within her drapery, questioned quickly, "Good or bad?"

"Both. And as you take it."

"Decius?"

"Is to be sent to the revolted army."

"That is foolish in Philip. The soldiers love Decius, and will proclaim him."

"Have a care what thou sayest!"

"Dost thou hope, Marina, to be empress again?"

"Not Philip's. And scarcely do I regret that I am not now. See. I am free from a chain I loathed, though the chain was gilded and I was proud to wear it!"

"Tell me how it was, Marina!" and the gentle girl laid her hand on the other with a caress, and seated her beside herself. Marina waited an instant, and then vehemently burst forth:

"If I was an unfaithful wife, Philip could not have known what I took such pains to conceal! If I loved another—if I loved Decius—"

"Decius?" cried Valeria, involuntarily pressing her hand to her heart, as if to still its beating, while her eyes revealed a sudden depth of feeling.

"Ay, Decius, I tell you!"

"One thing, Marina. Did he love, too?"

"And if he did?"

"I could not think of him then, as now. He would cease to be noble."

"You speak plainly! It matters not. No. Think nobly now, as ever, of Decius. He scorned my advances. Do not dream that for that I despair. If we three live, thou shalt yet see me die a conqueror!"

"Nay, nay, Marina, thou wert Philip's wife—"

"I am not now!" she answered, exultingly.

"That day! All the caresses he ever afforded, had he repeated; kissing my lips a thousand times, twining his white fingers in my long hair—it was perfumed and loose then, and I had color in my cheeks, my eyes were not hollow, and my lips were full and red—I was magnificent! I knew it. I obeyed him, and loved—"

"Hush! do not say it."

"That day," as if it gave her a pleasure to repeat it, "I woke early and called my maids. When my toilet was completed, I looked round for my bunch of keys, small, golden keys, and I wore them, though useless, as every Roman wife does, at my waist. They were not where I placed them, nor on the floor, nor in the caskets. My maids knew not what I sought. They were missing! Valeria, when a Roman matron is bereft of her keys, she is irrevocably divorced. I leaned one hand on the table, and pressed the other on my heart, as you did just now, Valeria. I could almost have pitied you. The great polished mirror hung opposite me; I saw myself pictured there, just as the truth flashed down on me. I left my astonished maids, and sought the atrium, where I knew Philip would be breakfasting alone.

"My keys!" demanded I, authoritatively.

"Without rising, he answered: 'I have sent the imperial keys to the Empress Julia—my wife!'"

"Your wife? And who am I?"

"That, at least, is not your title," said he, with a short laugh.

"Who was I yesterday?" I questioned.

"Ah!" he returned, "yesterday I was besotted and adored you. To-day I am undeceived."

"Why not have killed me, Philip?"

"It will be greater pain for you to live. Leave me. My messengers are already escorting the beautiful Julia hither; well pleased to be an empress!"

"And the Empress Marina?" asked I, doubtfully.

"There is no such person. You will leave me!" said he, coldly.

"All things grew dark to me, the room and the light. With my former rank and power, I could obtain all; now, I was obscure and impotent. I sat down and thought. A shout arose without, a confusion within. I looked up and saw Julia standing like a thing of light, shrouded in green and gold, a crown on her head, my keys at her waist, smiling, radiant, within the door. Then I came to you. It is eighteen days since. Julia was buried yesterday. Beware now! the keys may, nay will come to you!"

"To me?" cried Valeria, "O Heaven forbid!"

"Die, then?" interrogated Marina.

"If it must be."

"Die, quotha! Dying is fine sport! But die if thou wilt!"

"And why should any one die just now?" asked a deep, manly voice, and looking up, the lofty form of Decius stood before them. Athletic, sinewy, graceful, and with a face exhibiting on its handsome exterior the singular mixture of a smile for one, and a seriousness for the other. Valeria sprang to her feet, blushing and joyful, but Marina, raising her languid eyes to his face, only said: "We thought you with Philip."

"I go at once, madam," he answered, respectfully. "But may I ask the lady Valeria will she accord me a few words alone with herself?"

Valeria hesitated a moment, half drawing her hair within the net, then said, "Willingly!" and led the way into the gardens, while Marina, only following them with her burning eyes, remained where she was, even after they disappeared in the winding walks. They proceeded some time in silence, and at last paused under an ilex tree.

"Well," said he, at length, looking down at her and smiling.

"Well," she returned, half mimicking his tone.

"What is that scroll you have?"

She grasped it fervently.

"It is my strength."

"And what may that be?"

"Nay, of what use? Decius is a Christian, too."

"How know you that?"

"Marina told me and led me to the meetings."

"Marina is not a Christian. Marina deceiveth thee. Beware of her, I pray you."

There was an ineffectual assumption of pride in Valeria's manner, instantly yielding, however, to gentleness, as she answered:

"Not a Christian? Marina is my friend! Do not speak so. I pity her."

"Has she confided in you?"

"She has told me all."

He looked down at her.

"And can you trust her now?" he asked.

"Valeria, I go away commander, I shall return Imperator. If she has told you so much, you well know that your life will be her first step to the throne beside me. She has brought you into Philip's fancy, and she has stirred up this revolt for my elevation and your destruction. I am to be sent away, because he knows that I love you. That I love you, Valeria." And he grasped her hands, looking into her eyes that vainly endeavored to evade him, till coming back, something within her forced them to answer the earnest gaze.

"Valeria, darling! Is it true that my heart tells me, that I shall bear you by my side through all the shocks of time, my wife?"

Timid and bashful as she was, his lips were too near hers to receive any but one answer, and then she hid her face, ashamed, on his shoulder.

An hour passed ere Valeria entered the place where Marina sat.

"Where is Decius?" asked the latter.

"Gone to Philip," answered the sweet tones that could scarcely catch their breath for joy, while she stood there palpitating with happiness, and treasuring every word and smile of that last hour. A heavy footfall was heard, and the dark-bearded face of Vitellius, as he advanced, trailing his dark robes on the pavement, became visible.

"Hail lady!" he said to Marina, with an obeisance, and then folding his daughter in his arms, gazed proudly at her beauty, softly stroking her shining hair.

"And so Decius," said he, "hath asked me for my pet! Think you I can lose her?"

"Never to leave you, father! Never to leave you!"

"My little rose! my Hebe!"

They were standing directly before Marina, who, rising, stumbled, and in regaining herself caught at the garments of Valeria; the Christian scroll fell to the ground, half unrolled, and Marina glided away. Vitellius relinquished his daughter, and picked it up, holding it at arm's length and perusing it an instant. Still holding it he slowly turned, and with a terrible brow confronted his trembling child.

"Is it thine?"

"Mine."

"How camest thou by it? Answer me! By the sacred twelve! who gave thee this?"

"I cannot tell thee that, father."

"Valeria, my child, my only child; vision of thy dead mother! dost thou, too, my last and best, fail me? O, better be dead! better be annihilated, than live a Christian! Where gatherest these accursed lies? Tell me, child! Art thou a Christian?"

His voice grew dreadful, his face livid, his eyes transfixed her. Calmly extending her hand, she laid it on his.

"Father! Better not to know. Thou wilt not wish to be the instrument of thy child's murder. Wait. Thou canst even then punish."

He turned away with a bitter face and left her.

The sun was setting, and still Philip and Decius, the same day, were closeted in conclave. The former rose and walked the room with quick steps.

"I am determined," muttered he, inaudibly.

"He threatens me with loss of empire; if he can, he may and will! But I shall have entered on a costlier kingdom. I shall have made Valeria my empress! He will hardly wish to dethrone her, thus I shall be safe there. But till he is gone, I cannot obtain her."

"What say you, sire?" asked Decius.

Philip wheeled about.

"I say this!" retorted he. "Go, thou shalt, and this night!"

"As you please. Yet Philip, I go, but I return! and return no subject of thine. If thou wilt envoy me, it is at that price! Thou flingest thy crown at my feet, for I re-enter Rome, wearing it. Thou hearest me? I speak truly, I shall dethrone thee as surely as thou forcest on me this unwelcome task! I shall be—"

"Emperor!" laughed Philip. "Be not so earnest, good Decius! If you can, you are at liberty. None but you can quiet this revolt, and as we are speaking plainly, I have you in my power. I can afford to laugh. Hasten, now, the die is cast. Farewell!"

As Decius withdrew, Vitellius, his pale face wearing a look of weary earnestness, and telling of the storm he had passed through, entered.

"Welcome, Vitellius! And what are the omens to-night?" asked Philip.

"Prosperous for your majesty, bitter for others."

"That is well; they were so that morning I took my keys from Marina."

"Prithee, great Philip, why did Marina seek my house that day?"

"The hag! She knew well the future. What a morning that was! To what discoveries did I awake from my voluptuous dreams. Then how like a wild, mad creature she demeaned. Never, Vitellius, shall I forget her as she sat there in that low chair; the yellow, morning light flooding this black room and those panels of dark citron wood; her brow bound with a band of gold, and the great masses of her almost purple hair; her eyes shining steadily at a fixed point on the lower wainscot, and the rich crimson never varying on her brown cheek; the breath coming evenly through those half open lips; slightly bent forward; her long, white arms, her long, white hands clasped above the knee;—till Julia came standing before us, bringing the sunshine with her, laughing, radiant, crowned, and making music with Marina's keys. They were two splendid creatures! Valeria will live and reign longer."

"Valeria! Hast thou no heart, Philip? Valeria!"

"Ay, I said it. Last night I watched the stars from twilight to dawn, and they all said it. Think not my Arabian lore deceives me! I said Valeria, but not just at this moment."

"Philip! It cannot be. She is betrothed to Decius."

"Tush! I am at this hour amiable. Decius and I understand each other, it is a trial of strength between us. We have measured swords. Not a month, and we shall see who conquers. Go now, Vitellius, and tell me if the fates ordain Valeria's union with the Roman emperor!"

The words trembled on the faithful subject's lips, could his daughter be empress and Christian both? True to his faith, even if it tore out his own heart by bleeding roots, he could destroy her, but now, the father in him was still stronger than the priest, though it should not be so long, as he silently vowed, and left the palace.

Meantime, two figures stood beneath an arch at no great distance, the moon illuminating with a warlike glitter the steel greaves and casing of the one, and nestling lovingly, as it were, in the golden curls and snowy folds of drapery that adorned the other.

"And remember, Valeria," said Decius, "that if Philip insists, thou must hold him off awhile; but twenty-one days from this evening, and I shall save thee. I cannot be here sooner. Thou art strong in thy very weakness, brave in thy pretty bashfulness; be faithful, and I shall yet crown thee, not only empress of my heart, but of Rome. And Rome is our right, not that of a foreigner, an Arabian!"

"I will never be false!" she returned; "and rather than surrender to Philip, I will die on the sword, as Roman women have done before me!"

"God bless and protect you, my treasure!" And he was gone.

Seven days passed and no disturbance of the quiet air within the palace of Vitellius, gave warning of advancing terrors. Marina, pale and quiet, ruled the household, Valeria, joyous and confiding, pursued her happy course, and Vitellius, endeavoring to propitiate his offended deity, constantly kept watch in the temple. The morning of the eighth day dawned.

"Wake up, Marina!" cried Valeria, merrily calling the maids between, "time flies, my dear!"

But Marina was already awake and watching from a high window the procession forming at the imperial palace.

"Valeria," she said, "the keys are coming."

Her companion sprang to her side, it was true.

"Silence!" whispered Marina, "let your veil and pallium be brought. I will wear them and go in your place!"

"O, Marina! dare you?"

"Dare? I glory in confronting him! Not to save her," she murmured, as Valeria went to see her orders obeyed; "only to snare her deeper ere Decius return!" The light step of Valeria returning with the garments silenced her, and assuming them, she descended as the praetor, ediles and lords of the household entered.

"His majesty," said the smooth praetor, "sends by his unworthy slaves, the keys of his household to the lady Valeria! May he hope that she will accept them?" and he extended the golden bunch. The veiled lady bowed, affixed them to her girdle, and passed out with them.

"I scarcely dreamed the lady Valeria of such stature," said Philip, as he watched her coming, and ere long she stood alone before him in the place where he had a month before, received Julia.

"And is my conquest," said Philip, exulting in his apparent success over Decius, "to remain always veiled before me? Suffer me to remove the folds that hide the ravishing beauty of Vitellius's daughter from my eyes." And lifting the veil, he threw it back over her head. The basilisk eyes of Marina pierced him, as she uttered a short laugh, and made a profound reverence.

"A month," she said, "makes a difference in my ravishing beauty!"

"In truth it does, Marina!" answered the emperor, recovering his self-possession, "and another month will work further wonders in my dungeons or my arenas."

"Thy wife torn by wild beasts?" echoed she, mockingly.

"How often shall I tell thee, thou art no wife?" he cried.

"But I am, and thy words cannot alter it!"

He stepped towards her, and lifting his arm, he struck her fiercely. She met the blow without a quiver, but her pale face shot forth paler sparkles of wrath, as she returned: "I expected it. It does not take much to strike a woman. But neither dungeons nor bolts can confine her who knows every secret path and lock in Rome! One thing more I came to tell thee. She is a Christian!" Philip staggered back aghast.

"And now take her if thou darest!"

"Marina, thou omniscient—"

"Silence, blasphemer!"

The emperor turned away thoughtful a moment. "Ah," said he, at last, "that explains why Saturn Malevola was uppermost on the horoscopes last night. I could not divine Tush, woman! What difference will it make? I am not supposed to know, and if it be discovered in the future, let her die! What carest thou?"

"Heartless wretch! I care only for revenge on thee. If thou persistest in taking her, I will proclaim her faith in the streets, ere she reach thy palace! She shall be rent in pieces before thy longing eyes!"

She seized his hand and wrung it violently; when she dropped it, unperceived by him, in the fervent pressure, his signet ring was no longer on his finger. Philip grasped her shoulder, and called loudly for his slaves.

"The western closet," said he, significantly, when they appeared, and taking the keys from her girdle. The western closet was a cell in the top of one of the vast columns that surrounded the upper gallery, and within it Marina was thrust and left. But artfully concealed, the emperor's signet ring was on her finger, ready to aid her at any moment.

Hardly daring to connect himself with a Christian, Philip remained alone, closely shut up for three days, watching his calculations, observing the stars, consulting black letter chronicles and never missing his signet. The fourth day he came out, once more determined.

"Decius has already been two days with the army,—I must hasten," said he, and a second time the procession of the keys entered the house of Vitellius. Valeria herself met them this time, serious and calm.

"I cannot accept the emperor's keys," she answered. "Bear back to your master my faithful assurances as a subject, but never as his wife!"

The astonished courtiers, suddenly enlightened on recent proceedings, turned away with mortified eyes, and carried her words to the emperor. Shortly after the noble guard returned, and bore her off by force of strength to the judgment hall of the praetor Urbanus.

The elevated portion of the hall at the other extremity, where usually sat the praetor, being most gorgeously draped, a separate dais beneath a sumptuous canopy was raised upon this. On the dais, Philip was regally enthroned; by his side stood Valeria's father; below them in his usual seat, the praetor and the functionaries of the day filled up the intermediate spaces, as the maiden entered and stood plainly before them all.

"Lady," said the praetor, "you are here to answer an accusation of treason and disobedience to the royal command. Have you any defence?"

After the first moment's amazed shrinking, she looked clearly up, answering: "If what I have done is treason—none!"

"Let the witnesses be brought forward!"

A tedious time she stood alone without support, while a throng of servile courtiers only too gladly rehearsed the occurrences, commencing with the imposture of Marina, and adding original embellishments.

"And the prisoner has no defence?"

Valeria only shook her head.

"Pause, lady, ere sentence is pronounced!" ejaculated Philip; "accede even at this late hour to my request, and the empress of Philip will find no accusers!"

Valeria's lip curled in contempt, as she answered: "It were indeed gratifying to rule these wretches who were a moment since eager to betray me!"

"It were happiness!"

"I scorn such happiness!"

"By Venus! thou shalt not thus disregard me! Thou shalt be mine if every god in Olympus cried 'nay.' Thou shalt! eh?"

"I shall not," she answered, seeking her father's eye, which met hers as calmly as a stranger's. He had conquered himself—or more truly, the evil powers of superstition had conquered him, and perhaps there was a proud pleasure out of reach of the sting, in seeing his gentle child thus withstand the man whom all Rome feared.

"Give me," cried the irate Philip, "give me some reason."

She stepped forward, slightly extending her hands and gazing at him with clear hazel eyes.

"Sire," she said, "I am a Christian!"

A bolt from heaven seemed to have descended, transfixing spectator, guards, courtiers, praetor, emperor and priest. Though the last two knew it before, totally confounded by her unexpected declaration, and their own sense of guilty participation in the knowledge, they seemed to be struck into stone, and dead silence filled the place.

"Thou liest!" at last roared the emperor; "it is false!"

"I can call witnesses if necessary, but my own confession is sufficient," she said. "Let my father confirm my words!"

They all turned with terrified aspects to Vitellius, who, pressing both hands upon his aching heart, and bowing his head, said: "It is true."

"And thou, Vitellius?" asked the praetor.

"Am ready," returned the priest, "to offer her to the offended gods!"

A great cheer at the father's stoicism arose, while the steadfast smile on his daughter's face assured him of her undying love. The emperor bent forward to the praetor.

"When are the games appointed?" he asked.

"For the ides of October."

"And it is now the kalends," mused Philip.

"They await the return of Decius with captives," added the praetor.

"They must be earlier—much earlier," said the emperor. "I have well nigh lost my kingdom in a passion for this mad girl. The populace must be appeased. Earlier, I tell you!"

"The gladiators are in training. If your majesty found prisoners, it might be two days previous."

"Very well. There are twenty already, and I will add another, winding up performances by the sacrifice of Valeria. That will do for one afternoon, with a play in the evening, I think!" And Philip rose to sentence the prisoner. "The lady Valeria has chosen her lot," he resumed. "At the next games she will be sacrificed by her father on an altar raised in the arena, to Venus!" And waving his hand, she was borne away to the dungeons.

Marina, those four days, had sat silently pondering in her cell, and when that night the curator brought her food, she displayed the signet ring and commanded him to free her. Astonished, the man examined the ring again and again; it was real; he dared not disobey, and suffered her to step down upon the gallery and leave him.

It was no matter that it cost the poor fellow his life the next morning. Hastily crossing the well known ways, she entered the imperial sleeping-room. The emperor lay in profound oblivion. She bent over him. By a flame fed from a perfumed lamp, an instant a dagger gleamed in the air; another, and it had shrouded itself in flesh, while the blood of Philip spouted warmly into her face. A long, deep groan, and everything was still again, far stiller than before. Coolly wiping the dagger, "Not the first, thou shalt not be the last!" she said. "I hated thee always; now our accounts are squared!" And in the darkness of the night she glided away.

Her path lay by the Flavian Amphitheatre, and the signet ring still upon her finger, opened the way for her.

"I wish to feed the tigers!" she exclaimed; and the basket was put into her hand, the keepers accompanying her with torches. She entered the cage, throwing him the bits of meat one by one, till entirely gorged the beast refused more, and suffered her to stroke his tawny hide with her long, white fingers. For seven successive nights she repeated her visits to the amphitheatre, and in a few more the great games would come off; but secluded in the ruined Thermae all day, she heard nothing of the occurrences in the city.

"Valeria, at least, is done with! I will throw her dainty limbs to my tiger for a last meal, and then he may starve. And Philip! Philip is dead!" she murmured, exultingly. "I alone shall live to welcome Decius!"

Her path lay over the long since disused aqueducts. Was she mistaken in the sound behind her, like the march of many feet? No, she turned and saw the corselets of a maniple of soldiers sparkling in the moonbeams. Stumbling in her haste she fell, knocking aside a stone, and found herself in the centre of a trembling band of Christians below assembled in that unfrequented place for their devotions.

"Escape!" she cried, trusting to find safety with them. "They are upon you!" But before the words were fully uttered, the tribune, followed by his soldiers, leaped in amid them. Resistance was useless.

"A good two score added to the games!" cried he with an oath, securing the prisoners.

"Ha! whom have we here? Lady!" he said, throwing the chains round Marina: "We have most noble company for the beasts, yet I hardly dreamed of seeing an ex-empress devoured!"

"Nor wilt thou!" answered she, proudly, while something like despair, nevertheless, seemed to wrap her hitherto indomitable spirit; but they had been warned of her signet, and she disdained to disclaim Christianity. A few moments more and the old aqueducts rung to the departing steps, and subsided into primeval stillness, broken only by the distant sentry's cry. But hundreds of leagues away, there were other foot-falls, to be counted only by thousands, steadily and tirelessly echoing through the Northern forests, and seeking Rome with one accord, after their adored chieftain who had so many times led them forth to victory. Scarcely halting for the briefest rest, and snatching their rations by morsels, they thundered on, for if Decius was too late, he had sworn to deliver them to the anger of Philip, and hurl his proffered crown in their faces. And far within and below the heart of the great city, Valeria sat alone in her cell, ignorant of the passage of time, apparently deserted by father, lover and friend; betrayed and wretched, yet humbly trusting in God and relying on his will. * * * * *

The last day dawned, hailed by all the barbaric gala splendor of the Roman holiday. Half the population were in the streets, and thousands already bent their steps to the amphitheatre, to secure seats. The keepers were sprinkling the arena with fresh sand, and the distant growlings of the savage beasts, who had received no food for one or two days, elated the populace.

Morning deepened into noon ere the bolts of Valeria's dungeon were withdrawn, and the gaoler entered with her last meal. Setting the untouched viands aside:

"How long have I been here?" she asked.

"This is the ninth day," he gruffly returned.

"The twenty-first since he left me then," she murmured. "There is yet hope. But no. I dare not think of it, I was resigned before." And turning to him, "Where is the army?" she asked.

"Well, lady," he replied, "there are strange rumors that it is not far off, and that thus the games are hastened. But who knows? Come, I have orders that you be taken to the bath!" And he led her up from the dungeon into the cool, fresh air, and left her among her own sobbing but well-guarded hand-maidens. A few hours later, and she lay dressed in fragrant white, her long, bright curls bound by the sacrificial fillets of white wool, on a couch where all the winds that blew might cool and quiet her ere she appeared to furnish a moment's amusement, not only for the mob, but for those lords who had sighed at her feet, and those ladies who had made her protestations of eternal friendship. Cruel the agonies of that tender soul, as each moment her ears were mocked with the shouts that would soon peal over her, and the suspense, and hope of rescue from Decius grew momentarily more terrible and faint; and not even to speak one word, to give one kiss to her father, before she died. Almost, she prayed that her swelling heart might break. The acclamations from the amphitheatre grew fainter and fainter, and showed that the people were fast becoming dissatisfied at the paltry show prepared for them, when the blood-soaked arena was covered with fresh sand, and the ediles proclaimed the speedy entrance of the Nubian lion and the Bengal tiger, kept for the last, prior to the sacrifice; while a light altar was borne to the northern side, and a small, perfumed flame kindled upon it. All around, beneath, the arches of the dens yawned to let out their raging occupants, and the eager faces above were bent forward to watch the egress of the reserve. The emperor, pale, and by no means recovered from his recent wound, lay above on the imperial obolucum; but raising himself on his elbow, better to gratify his fierce revenge, waited as breathlessly as any.

The moment came. A gate was slowly drawn aside, and a tall woman—in long, imperial robes, looped on the shoulder above each bare, white arm, by a golden shell; her jetty hair bound beneath a crown, and a small dagger hanging by her side—stepped proudly down. The air was rent with shouts of joy, showing how well pleased the people were indeed, at so gorgeous a phenomenon. Philip waved his hand for silence, then looking down upon the victim, he pointed to his own wound, bowed and smiled.

"Thy Christian faith," said he, mockingly, in tones low, but distinctly heard through that vast space, "teaches thee peaceful deeds!"

The consternation of Marina on seeing Philip alive, whom she had, as she believed, herself slain, was instantly succeeded by a coolness equal to his own, while the red, so long banished from her cheek, once more enriched it.

"Philip knows," answered she, clearly, "how much his wife holds to a Christian creed; but false though her accusation be, do not let him think she quails! for as truly as I believe in the immortal gods, so would I never accept life from thee, thou craven! My revenge is complete."

If she would have said more, it was lost, for with a gesture from the emperor, the gates of two different cells, widely apart, flew open, and goaded by the tumult of the spectators, the two fearful beasts dashed into the ring with a yell, circling round and round, and lashing the sand with their tails. More erect than ever, Marina turned and followed them with her eye. The tiger, his eyes like great coals of fire, glowing in his head, gained on his adversary, and came nearer her in the swift circles. Suddenly the scent must have touched him as familiar, for leaping forward in a straight line, he knelt down licking her feet; it was evident that he remembered the bountiful feeder of so many nights, while crouching close beside her. But the lion—shaking his tawny, bristling mane, with his red jaws hanging wide, and his eyes sparkling beneath their fringes—paused, growling low, then reared, and with a terrific roar sprang upon her. The long, white arm was extended, with the dagger at its end, and as the beast bounded, received him on its point and sheathed the dagger to the hilt, in his heart. The roar changed into a snarl, and the Nubian lion fell backward, dead. The ediles gazed confounded at the throng, to see what should now be done. Charmed for once from their brutal teachings, to the nature of human beings, every thumb pointed downwards, signifying life and favor, but planting her foot on the dead lion with the tiger still crouching beside her, Marina curled her lip in defiant scorn. "A queen," she cried, "in the depths of Asia, gave me life! And do you think I would a second time receive it from a Roman Pleb? No!" and glancing like lightning, she buried the dagger in her own bosom.

Yells of execration burst from the thronging benches, increased by the confused tramp of a million without; just as, to appease the multitude, the massive slides were removed, and Vitellius, stern as fate, and armed with the sacrificial knife, stood in full sight, while opposite, stepping cautiously down with ponderous feet, an enormous snow-white elephant slowly entered, bearing upon his back a flat car, like a broad, crimson leaf, with slightly curled edges, in which half-lay the beautiful white-robed sacrifice. Raising his trunk, and entwining it round the leaf, he lifted it gently to the ground, and stationed himself beside it.

The murmuring outside the amphitheatre swelled in a vast volume, mingling with the exultation within, at this last spectacle; and with loud blasts of the trumpet, and neighing of steeds, while trampling down the few unwilling guards, a cohort of horsemen dashed within the place, and drew up at the northern side of the arena, around the altar.

Philip sprang to his feet with an oath, calling on his guards, and vehemently cursing their treachery.

The leader of the cohort rode out to the centre.

"I told thee, Philip!" cried Decius, "that I came back emperor. Behold! my conquering legions are within the walls. Your senate hails me, and your people proclaim me!"

"Balked! Balked!" groaned Philip, tearing the bandage from his wound, and thrusting his hands in the half-closed seam, till the blood gushed out and covered his royal robes, while he fell exhausted and dying in the very place where he had prepared death for tens of thousands. But Valeria's eye wandering round, had fallen, long since, on Marina, and springing from her car, she lifted the crowned head, and was completely absorbed in vainly seeking to staunch the blood.

"And that woman," muttered Vitellius, "would have slain her, and yet she strives to bring her back to life!"

"Surely, surely, Vitellius!" cried Decius, catching the expression of the priest's face, "a religion that makes us like that, a religion that is worth dying for, is worth living for! Decius, your emperor is a Christian! Hearken, all ye good people! Let the place be cleared, and come forth into the street. Bear that dead king to his solitude."

Awed and admiring, the populace obeyed, till Decius remained alone with Valeria and Vitellius in the arena. He dismounted and stood beside her. With a sigh she relinquished her efforts to restore Marina, and turning quickly sprang to his arms.

"Saved! Saved!" she murmured. "By you, my love! I could not have borne it from any one else!"

"Our prayers have been heard, my darling! Another moment had been death. Vitellius, would you really—"

"I should have slain myself afterwards!" returned the priest. "Can a faith that requires such deeds of a father be of any worth? Nay. Vitellius will forget it, and learn of his child the elements of a new manner of life!"

Still holding Valeria in his arms, Decius remounted and rode forth to meet his shouting subjects.

Philip the Arabian had been entombed several days, when the great triumph of Decius took place. Chariots laden with gold and ivory; tablets heaped with jewels; gigantic Goths from Northern wildernesses, leading huge, wonderful beasts, fresh from the jungles of India; kings walking in captive chains, and thirty crowns, borne by swarthy Africans, preceded him, gay as the perpetual carving of a Bacchanalian frieze. Vain were it to mention the wealth and splendor of that unsurpassed pageant; and equally vain to picture the beauty and joy of the Empress Valeria, enthroned beside the all-conquering Decius, with the golden keys of another household hanging at her girdle!

WELLS OF THOUGHT.

BY WILLIAM RODERICK LAWRENCE.

The wells of thought are deep,
 Few know from whence the flood
 That swelling, surging falls
 Hot drops of crimson blood;
 With a resistless sweep,
 That weaker sense appals.

Deep under-currents flow
 Circuitous and still,
 In silence, stealthily,
 That numerous meadows fill,
 O'er many an island slow
 Doth glide most warily.

Upon the surface oft
 A bubble may be seen
 To sparkle and to die;
 Like some oasis green—
 With verdure tender, soft,
 Beneath a brazen sky.

But as some seeds are borne
 Upon the trackless gale,
 To spots of richest mold;
 Thought's rarest gems may fall—
 Others defying scorn,
 Will live—of wealth untold.

And rarest beauty shed
 Through many a longing heart,
 Inspiring thoughts beside,
 Cause tears and smiles to start,
 Down rosy pathways led,
 Or dreamily to glide.

Where the pure spring o'erflows,
 Immortal in its course,
 Beyond the sea of time.
 Immortal as its source,
 It ever onward flows,
 Through every land and clime.

FOR BETTER OR WORSE.

BY HARRIET A. DAVISON.

DAY was just breaking, and the sun was tipping with gold, crimson and purple the spires of the different churches in Rheims and the heavy clouds which were rolling away towards the north, when a door of one of the handsome houses opened, and a young man slowly descended the steps and as slowly mounted a handsome bay horse which, held by a groom, was champing his bit and pawing the ground with impatience. After speaking a few words to the groom who held the horse, the young man gave his impatient steed the rein and dashed up the street, closely followed by his valet, who was mounted on a large gray horse. The hoofs of the steeds clanged merrily on the pavements, as they cantered up the silent and almost deserted street, startling here and there an early pigeon.

While the young man and his attendant ride on, we will pause awhile to look back a few years and become more acquainted with him.

Jules Demares, for that is the young man's name, is the only son of a rich merchant of Rheims. When Jules was fifteen, his father went to Paris, taking him with him to see an old friend, Monsieur Montalegre, who had only one child—a daughter two years younger than Jules. The two fathers, whilst sipping their wine together, concluded an engagement between the two children, the marriage to be consummated when Jules had attained his twenty-first and Blanche her nineteenth year.

The day was near at hand, and Monsieur Demares, now rendered almost helpless by the gout, had ordered his son to go to Paris and see Mademoiselle Blanche Montalegre, and make the necessary arrangements for their marriage. In strict and prompt obedience to his father's wishes, Jules set forth upon his mission. It was not with a very light heart that Jules proceeded on his way, for he was very brave, much admired by the ladies, and withal a passionate admirer of female beauty, and his only recollection of Blanche was far from pleasing. He had seen her but once while visiting in Paris with his father, and she seemed then thin, rather tall and awkward, a pale face rendered paler by a pair of large, dark, hazel eyes, over which the lids habitually drooped, which, together with the straight though well formed mouth, gave to the face an expression of sadness mixed with indolence and sullenness.

Scarcely, however, giving a thought to the object of his journey, Jules jogged on, allowing his horse to choose his own pace, enjoying the beautiful scenery, stopping occasionally to lounge idly beside a brook, so that the sun was almost set before he reached the town where he had decided to pass the night. He dismounted at the door of the inn, and throwing the reins to his servant, he entered the parlor where, to his utter astonishment, he was greeted with a roar of laughter from a man, a stranger, who stood at the front window.

"Well, well, my fine fellow, that horse of yours, which you ride with such a grand air, would look better if he was killed and stuffed with straw!"

The young man's eyes flashed, but he proceeded quietly to the other side of the room, paying no attention whatever to the insolent remark of the man, and flung himself upon a rough, wooden sofa.

"What immeasurable dignity for a boy!" said the man, now turning his jokes upon Jules.

Curbing still further his fiery temper, Jules continued gazing idly out of the window, striving to keep his temper down by thinking that the man was surely demented; but when the man approached him and bending his face so as nearly to touch that of Jules's, said with a jeer and laugh:

"Now don't take it as an insult, my dear fellow, but really if you were to spread some cream on your face and let a large-sized cat lick it, you would find you had no need to call for a barber!"

His control gave way, and it was with no light hand that he brought his light riding-whip across the insolent, coarse man's face, saying:

"Let any weapons, at any time, wipe away that mark, if you choose!" and he coolly sank into his seat, while his tormentor, Chevalier Polisart, raged round the room swearing and stamping his feet.

After awhile, he cooled down enough to appoint the yard behind the inn as the place, and swords the weapons, and the meeting to take place immediately. Jules Demares had seized his own sword and was about to follow Polisart out of the room, when a servant entered with his supper, and Polisart kindly consented to put off the affair of honor until he had supped. Jules Demares carelessly lounged in his chair, refusing the repeated invitation to sup given him by Monsieur Polisart, who recommended him to take all the comfort he could before he died, and proceeded to devour all set before him—chickens, muffins, cake, wine and many other condiments. He was just finishing the last muffin and chicken's wing, when the door opened and a young girl entered softly, and modestly approaching Jules, asked what were his wishes. Jules was on the point of replying, when Polisart rising from his chair, swaggered up to the blushing girl and thus addressed her:

"Ha, my pretty girl! have you come to gain that young fool's heart when you know you have mine—eh?"

The girl blushed painfully and stepped back with an air of disgust; but the bully was not to be put off so easily, and nearing her, he laid his hand upon her soft, white arm, and attempted to pinch, playfully, her chin, when he again felt the smart cut of the riding-whip and Jules drew the young girl from the rude hand, saying:

"This girl is under my protection, and unless you are a coward, as your behaviour seems to prove, you will not be slow in resenting the insult of my lash!"

Obedying a sign from the young man, the frightened girl left the room, and Jules followed the now almost insane man from the room. Swearing and kicking at everything that came in his way, Polisart proceeded to a place in the large garden, almost wholly hid from observation by a luxuriant grape vine. Here he delayed much—wiping his sword, bending it, buttoning and unbuttoning his coat, until Jules lost all his patience and coolly told him he thought him a coward and bully. Apparently he had by this time screwed up sufficient courage to take the first position, for he rolled his eyes, and declaring he would show the youngster what he was, he placed himself in a fencing attitude and began to count in a loud voice. He was to make a thrust at seven, and had in counting just reached five, when a servant poked his head through the bushes with:

"Monsieur Polisart, there is a lady in the parlor who wishes to see you."

"Let her wait till I have run this fool through the body!" returned Polisart, with an additional stamping of his foot and flourish of his sword.

"But the lady said her errand was life and death, and my orders were to bring you to her, dead or alive," replied the man in an earnest tone, while a side glance and merry twinkle in the eyes showed him to be enjoying some merry joke.

"Young man, you see I must go. I shall return in an instant. Do you wait me here, and I will be back to settle my little account with you!" And sheathing his sword with an air of great vexation and disappointment, Polisart started off.

Young Demares leaned quietly against the trunk of a tree, and began to trace figures in the gravel. The footsteps of his adversary had scarcely reached the inn door, when the servant approached Jules and said, with a respectful bow:

"Monsieur need give himself no trouble, for Monsieur Polisart will be careful not to find himself near his cool opponent!"

Jules laughed heartily, and desiring the man to show him to a private room, he followed him into the house. While Jules is discussing with much relish part of a cold roasted chicken, we will return to Monsieur Polisart. Although he set off towards the house with such speed, he entered it very slowly, and stopped and had a long talk with Alexis, Jules's servant; then he proceeded at a snail-like pace to the parlor, and with a reluctant hand turned the knob and entered the room. Upon his entrance a very handsome, black-eyed woman, who was impatiently tapping on the window-panes, turned and ran towards him.

"Polisart, I have been searching for you a long time. Where have you been?"

"I've been," replied he, looking up at the ceiling, down at his boots, and in fact everywhere but at the lady, "I've been—here—at this inn."

"Very well, monsieur, you won't remain here-long, if you have. Polisart," she repeated, laying her hand on his arm, "you have been trying to elude me. You will do so no longer, for I shall not leave you again until you are irrevocably my—husband."

Horror-struck he started back, and stammered out:

"But I have changed my mind altogether. I—"

"But I have not, monsieur, and shall hold you to your promise." And Mademoiselle Melami laughed maliciously as she said this, and carelessly threw herself into a chair and motioned Polisart to take a seat by her side.

Mademoiselle Melami was an actress, lively and handsome, and being heartily sick of stage life, had determined to marry some rich man and retire to private life. Polisart came across her path, and though vulgar, rude and old, he was far more wealthy than any of her younger and more prepossessing suitors, and perhaps more easily deceived, and after flirting with him, Melami had succeeded in obtaining from him considerable money and a written promise of marriage. This promise he had no sooner given, than he repented of having done so; and feeling sure that the lively actress would hold him faithfully to it, he fled and ensconced himself in the retired inn, thinking he stood in no fear of being discovered there by her, and besides, he found that the inn contained a pretty black-eyed maid, to whom he instantly made love—and it was thus matters stood when Melami made her unwelcome appearance.

Polisart fidgeted in his chair, hummed, bit his lips, but his companion's equanimity was not so easily disturbed. Melami sat quietly, leaning back on her chair, tapping the table near her lightly with her restless little fingers, and seeming to wait for Polisart to say something. At last Polisart, with a desperate effort, broke the silence with these words:

"I have considered it, and think I have hit upon a plan that will suit exactly. I know, and you may too, if you choose, a young man, Jules Demares, whom I was just going to kill, who is on his way to Paris to find a young lady to whom he has been betrothed for six years, and has never seen her during that time. He is wealthy, an only son and very handsome, and by a little management you might pass yourself off for the lady in question, Blanche Montalegre by name, and secure at once a rich husband with the addition of beauty and youth. What say you, my dear?" asked Polisart, with an uneasy look.

"Blanche Montalegre!" exclaimed Melami; "why, she is the young lady whose father has lately died, and she has disappeared, and I have lately purchased her house and came in search of you to live with me in it. Strange! However, a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush! How can I be so sure that I shall catch my rich young gentleman?"

"Admirable! This I will promise you, that if you strive to pass yourself off for the lady-love, and do all in your power to gain the young man, and in two months you do not succeed, I will fulfil my promise and marry you myself. Are you satisfied? You have now two birds in the bush, and if you do not succeed in catching one, you will the other. Are we agreed?"

"Perfectly. Now I wish you to give me all necessary instructions. But first"—and a doubtful smile played over Melami's face—"I wish to know where you got this information?"

"On my honor, my information I gained from the young man's rattle-pated servant. But what matters it to you? If you do not succeed with the young bird, you have the old one fast!"

Melami laughed a light, heartless laugh, and begged him to proceed in his lesson. He whispered for a long time, while Melami smiled and nodded in the pauses. Sometimes she fumed and shook her head angrily, but the conference ended, and Melami rose and said she must depart instantly, and Polisart with officious eagerness conducted her to a carriage which was waiting for her. They smiled and parted with great good humor.

Jules had finished his supper and pushed himself back from the table, and was enjoying the luxury of smoking, when the door was suddenly opened and Polisart unceremoniously entered the room.

"I am ready!" exclaimed Jules, springing up, throwing away his cigar and drawing his sword.

"Parbleu!" exclaimed Polisart; "put up your sword, young man, and hear me. If I hadn't been called away, I should have made a terrible mistake, for I should have killed the betrothed husband of my best friend, little Blanche Montalegre!"

"What do I hear?" exclaimed Jules.

"You hear the truth, young man. Just as I was going to seek you, I met your servant, who in an agony of grief at the idea of your being killed, threw up his hands and almost in frenzy exclaimed: 'What will his faithful affianced, Blanche Montalegre, do, when she hears he is dead?' The exclamation and name caught my quick ear; I asked him what he meant, and he told me the cause of your journey. I almost foamed with rage to think what I might have done. In one moment more, you would have been dead. When old Montalegre died, I was by his bedside, and he said to me: 'Polisart, I give into your charge the greatest treasure I had on earth; guard it carefully till young Jules Demares comes, or you hear that he is dead. When he comes to claim your treasure, give it up cheerfully.' Those were the last words the good old man ever spoke." And Polisart drew out his handkerchief and wiped his old, hypocritical eyes, while he heaved a deep sigh. "I cannot help thinking," he resumed, "that it was the hand of Providence that was stretched out to save me from rendering my dear child miserable, and gaining for myself an uneasy conscience the rest of my days. Accept my hand, and to-morrow, or any day that suits your convenience, I will conduct you to my sweet charge."

Jules stiffly took the proffered hand, and declared decidedly that he couldn't possibly leave for three days.

"Very well, very well, my young friend, I will not hurry you; and now I will leave you to your thoughts, which must be pleasant, as in a few days all your hopes will be fulfilled, and you will meet your beautiful bride." And with a laugh and flourishing bow, Polisart withdrew.

"What can I hope," exclaimed Jules, as he paced restlessly up and down the room after his hated companion had fairly gone, "what can I hope to find Mademoiselle Blanche, if that old scamp has had the guidance of her for even one day? and Montalegre has been dead some months; and besides, if he was a friend of Montalegre, Blanche has probably seen more or less of him all her life. Bah! were it not dishonorable, I would go home instant. What care I? I have seen the girl but once when we both were children, and since then I certainly have not built any castles in the air in which Blanche had any interest, and I am also perfectly heart whole, and it is not likely that a charge of Monsieur Polisart's will touch it—so why should I be disappointed?"

Polisart and Jules presented themselves, one fine morning, at the door of a handsome house in one of the most fashionable streets of Paris, were admitted, and shown into a spacious drawing-room by a smart servant. The room was elegantly fitted up, and bore marks of great taste and refinement. Jules was fast losing himself in meditation, when he heard a light footfall, and upon looking up, he saw a graceful, pretty woman, dressed in some light floating material, gliding across the room. The face was very fair—black eyes, very white teeth, and a mass of black hair falling in ringlets over her shoulders, which were only covered with a light fall of lace, and her beautiful, white arms were wholly bare. The girl bounded lightly up to Polisart and threw her arms round his neck, while she said, in a low, soft voice:

"Dear old Monsieur Polisart, how glad I am to see you back, and safe and sound! You don't know how much I have missed you, and how lonely I felt until that sweet little pet of a waiting maid came. How kind of you to put yourself to so much trouble—and all for me! Cecile is very amiable and pretty, too! Why, I am almost afraid to let her be seen, and feel tempted to keep her in almost close confinement. Indeed, I am afraid I shall get to be jealous of my little maid ser—" Here she suddenly stopped, as if conscious for the first time of the presence of Jules, and blushed deeply, looked confused, and as if she would fain have run out of the room to hide her embarrassment.

"This, my sweet Blanche, is Monsieur Jules Demares. Never heard of him before—eh?" asked Polisart, as he playfully pinched her cheek.

Blanche smiled shyly, and with an air in which were mixed in a charming manner both timidity and cordiality, she extended her hand and welcomed Jules in gentle tones to her house. Jules was charmed with the childlike simplicity and grace, and was almost ready to take her without further acquaintance. They sat and chatted away until dinner was announced, and Blanche led the way to the dining-room. Blanche made herself very agreeable, and soon chatted without reserve with Jules.

After that time, Jules became an almost constant visitor at the house. Sometimes he would come away feeling almost disgusted with some levity of the lady's, and he would then stay away for a long time; then, again, he would be pleased with her gentleness and simplicity, and go away vowing that the next day should decide his fate. It was with this determination that he mounted the steps and entered the house one morning. The servant said his lady had been called out unexpectedly, but had left word to have him come in and make himself at home. Accordingly Jules proceeded to the drawing-room and prepared to settle himself comfortably, when he saw his lady's work-table standing by a window, and looking as if it had been closed in a hurry. Jules walked up to it and with a sudden impulse he opened it, saying: "I must see if my lady is neat." The contents of the table were various and in a great deal of confusion, but laying on the top of all the articles was a gold miniature case, with the back uppermost, on which was engraved: "Blanche Montalegre—aged fifteen, June 11th, 1813."

"Taken four years ago! I wonder if she has changed much since then!" murmured Jules, as he slowly turned the face uppermost.

He started with surprise, for he immediately recognized, not the features of Mademoiselle Blanche, but of the young girl he had defended from Polisart's rude advances.

"How is this?" he exclaimed; "I must get at the bottom of it!" And scarcely knowing why, he rushed out of the room and up stairs to the little boudoir of Blanche, where she sometimes allowed him to come.

He was yet more astonished when he opened the door and espied, sitting in a chair, her hands clasped, and tears coursing each other in quick succession over her pale face, the young girl of the inn. She gave a slight scream and attempted to leave the room, but firmly, though gently, Jules made her retain her seat, while he kindly asked her name.

"My name, monsieur, is Blan—I mean Cecile Montaigne. I was thinking of my mistress when I spoke," she replied, modestly.

"Be not alarmed," said Jules, gently. "I am your friend, and will assist you in your trouble, if you will confide to me the cause. Will you not do so?"

"Monsieur," gravely returned the girl, "you were kind to me once, and I will trust you, for I have no other friend in this world—no friend save God!"

"I assure you, you will not repent doing so."

"I know who you are, for I have often heard my mistress speak of you, and I know that you two will be united shortly. Your wedding-day seals my doom, for the day before the one fixed for your marriage, I am to marry Polisart—my mistress sells me to him. I cannot help myself, for I am poor and dependent, and almost a close prisoner, never being allowed to go out alone."

"Can it be possible? I will aid you, but you will keep up a brave heart. Fear not—I shall never marry your mistress. I will only—but I hear voices in the entry. Conceal me somewhere, and let me out as soon as you can."

So speaking, Jules sprang into a wardrobe just in time for Cecile to close the door as the boudoir door opened and Blanche, followed by Polisart, entered the room. Blanche sharply bade Cecile leave the room, though Polisart begged she might stay; but Blanche coldly repeated her order to go, which was obeyed with trembling alacrity. No sooner had the door closed, than Blanche burst forth with a volley of reproaches and sneers.

"Polisart, you are an infernal old scoundrel!" she almost screamed. "You promised me that if I did all as you directed, the young man would marry me in two months. Four have passed, and he is no nearer that than he was a year ago. Now listen: You sent me Cecile Montaigne as a waiting-maid, but only that you might be able to see her, and I have given you every opportunity of doing so, and—"

"Well, you vixen, haven't you in the meantime been able to flirt and cajole the young man? If you have lost him, it is through your own shrewish disposition and intolerable nonsense!" retorted Polisart.

"Cease, you old prater, and keep your ears open till I tell you something which will spoil your fun as well as mine. Cecile Montaigne is the true Blanche Montalegre!"

"Diable!" exclaimed the old rascal, while his broad face paled.

"Yes, what I tell you is true. I thought she seemed strangely well acquainted with this house and all its windings, and you know how many and crooked are the passages in it;" and Blanche half closed her eyes and drew up the corners of her mouth with a malicious expression. "She can go all over the house in the dark, which she could not do unless she had lived here very long. To-day my suspicions have been confirmed, for I happened in one of the upper rooms to find in an old box filled with rubbish a miniature marked Blanche Montalegre—a perfect likeness of Cecile. I have questioned her respecting her past life; but she says only:

"I was once such as you, lady, and lived in a large house, perhaps this very one, but my father died and a wicked, heartless man took all the property left me to liquidate a debt my father had contracted and never paid. I was obliged to seek for a livelihood and so became a waiting-maid."

"That is what she says, and I know the man of whom I purchased the house to be a great rascal. Another thing, the poor child loves Jules, for she says he protected her from insult. I don't care, for I have a written promise of a certain person to marry me if Jules Demares does not." As she said this, she drew her hand lightly across Polisart's face, asking if he was dreaming.

He pushed the woman aside and rushed from the house. Blanche laughed a moment, then turned to the glass and began to arrange her toilet, laughingly exclaiming :

"I must look simple and piquant, for that pleases my dear Jules."

"It pleases him no longer!" exclaimed a voice; and turning, the astonished woman saw Jules standing in the room regarding her scornfully. Recovering her self-possession, she ran towards him with a smile and word of welcome, which he repelled, saying: "I overheard the conversation between you and Polisart, for I was in the wardrobe. I heard all, and it has only confirmed my suspicions. Prepare instantly to leave the house. When you are once out of it, I will refund to you the money you paid for it, and all the expenses you have been obliged to incur to keep up your shameful deception."

Melami—for we will now call her by her right name—buried her face in her hands, then raised her head, rose and rang the bell. In a moment Cecile appeared, but started upon seeing Jules standing there. Melami took the girl's hand and leading her up to Jules, said :

"Here is the true Blanche Montalegre. Take her and love her and cherish her always, for she is worthy of all affection. I began the deception, caring little for the person, merely wishing to obtain a rich husband, but I ended by loving you, Jules Demares. My dream is over and I will go now, but daring to hope that when you have sweet Blanche by your side, you will forgive but not forget the misguided and unfortunate Melami."

With tears in her large eyes, Melami bowed and disappeared.

One week afterwards, Jules and Blanche were united; and Jules had the affair of the seizure of old Montalegre's property investigated; but though it was proved to be a fraud, but very little of the property could be recovered. But that grieved him not, for he had more than sufficient for all his desires.

Polisart disappeared, and it soon became noised about that he had gone to America. Melami followed him, discovered his whereabouts, and at last succeeded in making him fulfil his promise of marrying her. A few years they lived together, leading a cat and dog life, when Polisart died, leaving considerable riches to Melami, who immediately returned to Paris, where she resumed her vocation of actress. She saw Jules and Blanche frequently, and was always treated with great kindness. They lived a very happy life, and Jules never had occasion to repent that he had taken his wife FOR BETTER OR WORSE.

TO LITTLE ELLA.

BY LILIAN LYLE.

Laughter-loving little Ella,
Gentle, playful, frank and kind,
Unto thee are kindly given
Beauties both of form and mind.

Smooth and fair thy soft round cheek,
Rich thy dark eyes' lustrous glow;
While thy braids of shining hair
Fall around thy neck of snow.

Of thy white arms round my neck
All lovingly are thrown;
And oft thy little rosy cheek
Is pressed unto my own.

There's music in thy whispered tones,
And in thy shouts of glee;
And the pattering of thy busy feet
Is music sweet to me.

May God protect and guide thee ever,
My darling little one!
And shield thee from the blight of sin,
Till thy last setting sun!

Then gently when 'tis thine to die,
And life's last throbb is given,
May thy pure spirit pass away,
To rest for aye in heaven.

EVELYN ARMITAGE.

BY ALICE C. BENTON.

I MET Evelyn Armitage at Madam Lombard's school. She was my first friend in that dreary establishment—my first and only companion in that unutterably hard bed. She sat beside me as I ate the dry and heavy slice of bread, spread with butter of unmistakable strength; and together we sipped the muddy and almost milkless beverage which they called coffee. Together we mourned over the toughness and hardness, the scantiness and shabbiness which madam contrived to mingle with every portion of our daily fare. Together we recalled, with the keen appetite of growing youth, the delicious compounds of our home cookery.

Let me describe this beautiful Evelyn. It was her fifteenth birthday when I arrived. She was not very tall, but there was a perfect fullness of figure, such as is rarely seen in girls of that age. Her face had a radiant fairness, a sort of glittering white, unlike the chalky cheeks of which there were a profusion in the school. Blended with this, was the slightest perceptible roseate hue; but the lips were crimsoned deeply. Eyes of that soft, velvety black, as far removed from that class of eyes usually called brilliant as they were from those called tame and expressionless. No pen can describe those eyes—no artist could paint them. Like her glorious hair, the peculiar shade of color could never be identified. It was indescribable. Hands and arms of the most exquisite moulding and color, and feet just of that peculiar adaptation of size to the rest of the person, were hers in perfection. Her manner of carrying her head, that small and faultless head, set so beautifully upon the slender neck, was not less observable.

All these things I saw, for I was a worshipper of beauty in all its forms. One thing I did not see, until it was forced upon me by long suffering. It was that, under this beautiful exterior, there was an icy coldness, that arose from her deep, unconquerable pride. This was her besetting sin. Vashti herself never queened it more stately than this youthful school-girl. Her whole bearing was superb.

How I loved her! It was as if I had a lover, my devotion was so deep, so earnest. It was that sort of love which is the type and the prophecy of the heart's future devotion. She received my love as though it were her due, but she took small pains to return it. I was jealous of any rival in her affections, and when she bestowed her smiles upon Catherine Moore or Sybil Ackerman, I reproached her bitterly. Her calm, unmoved way of taking this irritated and mad-dened me. She was not to be scolded or reproved. She was impenetrable as ice; nay, she was ice itself. I do not now know how I came to love one so unimpressible, when my own nature was so fiery, except on the principle of attracting opposites.

With all this ice, however, there was a certain inner temple in her heart, to which this column of ice helped to form the pillars of the vestibule—a sanctum, kept for some presiding deity, who should come in the aspect of a lover, and dwell there forever. Evelyn could love but once, and that would be always.

In her school exercises Evelyn was always perfect. Her coolness and self-possession were invaluable to a student; and her pride never permitted her to allow any one to distance her in the pursuit of knowledge. She was thorough, real, practical. Once learned, her lesson was always hers. She could not transfer nor forget it. She could not commit a lesson so quick as I could, but when hers was fixed immutably in her mind, mine was scattered to the four winds of heaven.

Evelyn had no imagination. She read page after page of the most burning poetry with perfect coolness; and even would criticize the rhythm or the sentiments, when others were thrilling with the glorious inspiration they brought from the hearts that conceived them.

Glorious, radiant, beautiful Evelyn Armitage! How many times have I heard her called by these names. How many times have I heard her called proud! But never did I hear her called gentle, tender, or sensitive. I, who loved her so fondly, never gave her these names.

I had supposed, from the number and quality of Evelyn's dresses, that she must be the daughter of a rich man. Her imperial taste selected the richest of material, the most faultless of fashionable shape for her garments; and she wore them as a queen her coronation robes. She did not love jewels. Her own superb beauty needed them not. Nor did she affect the simple decoration of flowers. She loved best to array herself in a single dark, rich dress, and to dress her magnificent hair in large bands and braids, simply around her head. If a loving hand laid a splendid flower amidst the braids, she would allow it to remain; but never was one there by her own wish. We passed one year together. We were of the same age, in the same class; we left school together, and together we travelled towards home.

Not until we neared the town where I was to be left, did she tell me that she too was an inhabitant of the same town. She had hitherto concealed it because her father was only a mechanic! Only a mechanic! Only one of those whom the world could not do without, while it would dispense gladly with hundreds of the useless and miserable gentlemen whose presence is so unwished for and so unsought!

False pride (Evelyn had some true pride too) prevented her from avowing this mortifying circumstance. During the year at school, she had been especially careful not to associate with the daughters of any but the wealthiest and most fashionable, and even to them, she had maintained an air of quiet but conscious superiority. But each one supposed that her circumstances warranted it, and they gave way to the influence which she silently exerted over them.

Soon after our return from school, we exchanged calls, and then my intercourse with Evelyn ceased. I still loved her—still thought her the most beautiful of beings—but some troubles arose in her family of a nature so unpleasant as to preclude my visiting there, and I saw her no more.

Not long after this, I heard she was married, and had gone to New Jersey. I asked to whom, and received for answer the name of one whom I well knew, but who, of all beings, was the most unfit to be the husband of Evelyn Armitage. Indolent, unattractive, careless of exterior refinement, I could not conceive of any one more unsuited to the fastidious, sensitive taste that she had ever exhibited. I wept that night, for the life to which she must awake, when the temporary delusion should be over. And yet, I had not imagined the half.

Pleasure-loving people are sometimes at a loss how to invest their time so as to cover the largest ground of enjoyment. Travelling offers the strongest inducements in the way of variety; and, nine years after I left school, still unencumbered by love or husband, I joined a party of these same pleasure-lovers, whose route of travel was to lie just where inclination might lead. It was delightful to be in this perfect freedom; not to have friends at home waiting for letters to tell them the exact day on which we should reach certain destinations. We were to turn aside whenever we saw a prospect of enjoyment by so doing.

It was delicious summer weather, our party were in the highest spirits, our travelling costumes in the best order, and we were on good terms with each other. What more could we ask? It was a season long to be remembered, and it dwells on my memory yet, with a richness and raciness that time has not been able to diminish.

If M—— still lives to read this, will he not remember, in his dwelling far away towards the setting sun, the day in which we two left the lagging travellers behind, and rode forward to secure a resting place for us all in that embowered farm-house? Will he not remember that avenue, where the trees met in a long unbroken arch above our heads, and the cool springs that bubbled up by the wayside, the perfume of sweet brier in the greenwood, and the delicious poetry which flowed from his lips?

Perhaps to him it is all a blank. Farms, the rise and fall of stocks, monetary affairs, the cares of wife and children and servants may have banished from the memory of the man the fresh and glowing happiness of the youth; but to me, who have wandered on in single blessedness, a poor, solitary old maid, the remembrance of such hours comes back to me "like the green spots that bloom o'er the desert of life."

On our way, we passed a poor, shabby, unfinished frame house, standing very desolately in the midst of a small cleared space. It was the first house we had seen for an hour's riding, and it had altogether an unprepossessing, nay, a repulsive appearance. Loose boards hung here and there, the yard was in bad condition, and everything betokened poverty and indolence. Two or three children, one a mere infant, were playing by the roadside, and the eldest, a little ragged boy, but with a face beautiful as an infant Guido, ran directly before my companion's horse, and fell. The horse merely touched him with his fore foot, as he fell, and then stood perfectly still, while M—— dismounted and took up the child. It was not hurt, but frightened; and fastening the horses to a tree, we carried the little one into the house.

A woman stood at a table, performing some household duty, with her back towards us. She evidently had not witnessed the accident. As we entered, she looked round. Even in the midst of surroundings so opposite to what I had ever seen her before, it was impossible to mistake that face for any other; and yet, had my life depended on the words, I could not have addressed her by her name. It was Evelyn Armitage, but so altered that, except for the glorious eyes, and soft, beautiful hair, I should never have known her. Exposure to the sun and wind had roughened and darkened that glittering, satin skin; sorrow, perhaps want, had sharpened the once rounded outline of form and face; but in the eye there was the same majestic look of superiority which here, in this solitary place, and under such circumstances, would have struck me in any one else as simply ludicrous; but in Evelyn it was innate, and could not be altered or affected by any mere outward surrounding.

Beautiful she was still—proud she was still—and I thought so then, in the brief moment in which my friend was explaining to her the slight accident which had so frightened her child. She was courteous enough, but it was evident that she was restive under our eyes; and not wishing to prolong an interview so painful, we departed. I do not know to this day, if she recognized me, but I believe she did. Pride would prevent her, indisputably, from making the first recognition, but I had not changed, and she must have known me. The children were lovely. The boy was beautiful as an angel—and yet she showed no affection for them, even when the frightened child was brought in, apparently hurt. The old ice had not melted.

For the next two miles I wept unceasingly. M—— left me to cry to my heart's content, before he asked a question. Then, when I had become quiet, I related to him the history of this glorious creature. He was intensely interested, for he had known her husband many years before.

"Yes; Theodore Grainger was well known to me, and still better known to my brother. We liked his amiable disposition, but we had a great contempt for his indolent, unthrifty ways. He was a gourmand and epicure; but he would not lift his hand even to procure luxuries for himself. He was just the being who would cause a proud wife to bury herself from all the rest of the world. If she could be contented with his affectionate manner towards her, she would not, perhaps, kill herself, but if she was passionate and exacting, there must be some terrible hours for her."

As M—— and myself rode on, we talked long and freely of Evelyn's besetting sin; and I related to him many circumstances of her early youth, at Madame Lombard's school. Her youth! why Evelyn was yet but twenty-six years old, and age had come upon her with its blight already, or else she had become "older than age, with sorrow."

It was a sad drawback to the gaiety I had promised myself for the next three or four weeks—this little episode of Evelyn's:—but I strove to forget it. Evelyn had chosen her path, why should I mourn her mistakes? So I became as selfish and as gay as pleasure-seekers generally are.

If I live to be a hundred years old, I shall never forget that season. It gave me an idea of what life might be if people would but lay aside their senseless devotion to fashion and folly, and dwell with simple nature, "who never did betray the heart that loved her." It initiated me into a thought of what paradise must have been before the bitter tree of knowledge had given its fruit to the lips of our first parents. M——, you will read this when you are sitting by that clear spring which you say bubbles up so sweetly by the green bower where you can overlook the broad prairie; "you will read and remember and understand!"

Ten years after this happy year of my life found me a helpless invalid, weary of life, heart-broken at the loss of parents, sisters and other dear friends. I felt myself a stray waif on the ocean of life, which it would be well for the billows to roll into the abyss below. Useless, useless was my thought from morning until night, and often through the dark and dreary hours too, I would lie awake and think how utterly vain was my living at all.

But when the sweet, dewy June came, with its wealth of roses, its pure refreshing airs, and its thousand melodies, my best of friends, Kate Dalrymple burst into my chamber one morning, and with a voice as cheerful as a lark's, she bade me rise and shake off my illness and dejection, and let her pack my trunks for a journey, with herself and her husband. It was like an electric shock, but I submitted, too weak for resistance.

"But what shall I wear, Kate? I have nothing but morning wrappers."

"Look here," said she, and she pointed to a basket of clothes, which her servant was bringing in, with two complete travelling dresses, and everything requisite for a long journey.

"O, Kate!" I began, but she stopped me.

"We start at half-past one," she said, "so let Nanny and me get you all ready now, and then you can lie down again until I call you."

Under her gentle hands, I was soon equipped. A handsome, fashionable habit, yet made loosely, as it should be for a invalid, everything in good taste, yet easy fitting, so as not to annoy or distress me, bore witness to her careful and thoughtful love.

At half past one the carriage came. It was an open one, and Charles Dalrymple was to drive, while his wife occupied the seat beside him, and the ample back seat was reserved for myself and Kate's sister, a cheerful, happy girl, who had often cheered my sick room with her joyful laughter.

"Drive slowly, at first, Charlie," said Kate, as we started, "Fanny will soon get used to the motion." I did so—and every mile that we passed I became refreshed and invigorated. We made short stages; and by the time that we reached our longest destination, I was a new being. Change of air, different scenes, beheld under the delicious blue sky of summer, and the heart-felt kindness that prompted the excursion for my sake, all did their part, and I felt myself re-created. I could not realize, at the end of a fortnight, that I had lain on a sick bed so long, thanks to the kindly love of my companions, who consulted my wishes in all things pertaining to our journey.

We were on the sea-coast now. The weather had become warmer in the inland towns, where we first went, and the breeze from ocean drew us to its side. O, how sweet were those hours, passed on that beautiful beach! How delicious the shadow of that mighty rock, under which we sat and inhaled the sea-breeze! How well Kate and Jennie looked in their pretty bathing dresses and straw hats, when they ran across the beach to plunge into the waves; and how awfully they looked when they came out, with their wet, limp skirts clinging to their slight figures, and their hats heavy with water!

Among the innumerable children whose little feet paced the sands daily, I had always noticed a beautiful boy, of perhaps thirteen or fourteen years old, who seemed to shun the rest, and who walked, generally, apart by himself. His face recalled another, but whose I could not remember. He was always accompanied by a lady in deep mourning, who wore her veil down. As I did not bathe, I had leisure to observe others; and this group interested me much. The lady was usually left alone, for the boy walked, as I said, mostly by himself, and one day I spoke to her upon the beauty of the sea, which was then calm and serene in its summer stillness. Her voice startled me, it was so like one that seemed to come up to me from the very depths of my memory.

Just then, the boy, whom she called Reginald, came up, and one look at his eyes brought the whole before me.

"Is it you, Evelyn?" I said, forgetting that in our last interview I had not spoken to her.

"It is Evelyn," she said, mournfully. "I have known you every day, Fanny, but I could not bear to reveal myself to your remembrance. I wished you to speak first."

We talked together long and earnestly, and for several succeeding days we sat under the shadow of the rock, and she told me all her trials. Her pride had been brought down so low—she was so subdued now. Her husband had continued his idle and miserable habits, until she was obliged to support him entirely. They had lived where I had last seen them, until she could no longer endure it. By a great effort she succeeded in inducing him to remove, and to take up his abode in the city. Here her two youngest children died. She pressed down the tears that welled up from her maternal heart, and tried to thank God that they were taken away.

Her husband had some talent, and she besought him to write, encouraged him in his feeble efforts, and after all, she, who, at school, would never (if possible to get clear of the task) so much as answer a letter, now wrote for bread. She took the pictures out of her own heart, and the scenes she drew were too touching and natural not to charm. O, ministry of sorrow, what beauty of thought and expression is thine!

After a while, he fell sick, and then she had suffered still more intensely. His selfishness, his querulous repinings, his exacting temper—she touched lightly on these—but I saw them all, running, like a dark thread, through her narrative, and shadowing her face with a deeper grief than that even for which we mourn the good.

"Had it not been for Reginald," she said, looking at the boy, as he stood on the beach, with an expression of such unutterable love as I could hardly think it possible for Evelyn to feel,

"had it not been for that beloved child, I must have sunk under my trials. His love, and my remaining pride kept me up."

I looked at the boy. What a glorious creature he was, as he stood there, with the slight breeze lifting his hair from a brow such as I had never seen before. I did not wonder at her love and pride now.

After her husband died, she had met with a relative of her own, who had been absent several years in India. He threw himself upon her cares, for he was a sad invalid; and he rewarded them by leaving her his worldly store. She had placed Reginald already at college, and was looking forward to his future with a hope that seemed likely to be realized. I parted from her with half my old love and reverence for her renewed. She had proved herself worthy of it.

I sometimes hear from her now. She and Reginald are all the world to each other. He is all that she could wish; and he thinks that his mother is an angel. Their beautiful devotion to each other is the theme of all who know them. Evelyn's sunset seems to be drawing onward without a cloud.

A SMART MILKMAID.

The worshipful Sir Digby Somerville did keep a bountiful house full ever of brave company, at his seat in Suffolk. At one time among his guests did happen a young gentleman from the Court, whose apparel was more garnished with lacings and gold than his brain with modesty or wit. One time going into the fields with his host, they did espy a comely milk maiden with her pail.

"Prythee, Phillis," quoth the courtier, leering the while at the girl, "an I give thee a kiss, wilt thou give me a draught of thy ware?"

"In the meadow," quoth she, "thou wilt find one ready to give thee milk, and glad of thy kiss, for she is of thy kin."

The court gallant looked in the mead, and espied a she-ass.

"So sharp, fair rustic," quoth he, angrily, "thou lookest as if thou couldest barely say boo to a goose."

"Yea, that I can, and to a gander also."

Whereat she cried out lustily, "Boo!"

The young man hastened away, and the worshipful Sir Digby did laugh heartily, and entertain his guests with the tale.—Book of Merrie Jests, 1609.

GREAT MEN.—The great village politician is lost in the town; the town lion is regarded as a mere kitten in the metropolis. The city alderman is lost in the world. Country clergymen and rural justices, who command infinite respect on their own glebes and acres, cannot understand, on coming to London, how it is that all Cheapside and Regent Street to boot, do not touch hats to them.—Blackwood.

FAR O'ER THE DEEP BLUE SEA.

BY MRS. KENNEDY LACERT.

Nay, nay, my mother, chide me not,
Nor bid me check the tear;
Nor tell me in those bitter words,
That I must tarry here;
For since young Leon left his cot,
Beneath the willow tree,
My heart has shared the wanderer's lot,
Far o'er the deep blue sea.

I love my home, my sunny home,
I love the silvery Rhine;
Each vesper bell, with lute-like tone,
Peals forth a hallowed chime;
The fragrant flowers, the wild bird's song,
They have a charm for me;
But ere they greet the spring I'll go
Far o'er the deep blue sea.

Then chide me not, my mother dear,
Nor bid thy child to stay;
Though basking 'neath thy sunny smile,
My heart is far away!
But when I'm in those solemn woods,
How oft I'll think of thee;
Then, mother, bless me ere I go,
Far o'er the deep blue sea.

Speak not of perils I must brave,
Nor dangers on the deep;
I will not shrink, though winds and waves
Their ceaseless vigils keep;
For He who guides the wild bird's course,
Will ever watch o'er me;
Then, mother, let me go in peace,
Far o'er the deep blue sea.

ON A LEE SHORE.

BY FRANCIS W. SAWTELLE.

QUITE a number of years ago, when your father was a little shaver, who played marbles, and was spanked for being late at school, the clipper schooner Flirt, of Baltimore, left that port on a trading voyage to the west coast of Africa. Her captain was a jolly old rope hauler, of great weight in the community, and measuring almost a thousand miles from the middle waistband button in front, through to the waistband buckle in the rear. This, I am aware, seems almost incredible, but as you were not born at that time, and consequently can know nothing whatever about the matter, it is not in good taste, to say the least, for you to dispute me.

It was the custom at that time, on board the smaller crafts, for the officers and crew to eat and live together, on a footing of equality, as is the practice to this day, on board down-east coasters; the semi-barbarous people of that benighted region seeming to think that a man, although he happen to be a sailor, is nevertheless a human being, and deserves to be treated as such; their half-civilized ideas being very much the same as were entertained by the Irishman, who, upon being asked if in his opinion one man was not just as good as another, replied: "Faith, yes, and better, too."

On board the Flirt the most perfect equality reigned; indeed, a stranger would have been somewhat puzzled to decide whether old fatty Flukes was the captain, or the cook's private secretary, without he had looked on board of us at about meridian, when he would have seen our ponderous commander standing upon the booby hatch, with the pig yoke to his eye, shooting the sun. Mighty free and easy times did we have on board the old schooner, but the work was nevertheless carried on with as much regularity and promptitude, as in one of our monstrous modern packet ships, where every order from an officer is given under oath, and nine times out of ten, enforced by a blow with a belaying pin over the head.

Our destination was the Guinea coast, where we expected to trade in palm oil, ivory and so forth, and as in those days particular attention was given to the so forth, as by far the most profitable, we had very little below the deck beside water casks and provisions.

The first part of our passage across the puddle, was particularly prosperous, with leading breezes most of the time, until well up with the coast, and near the entrance of the Bight of Benin; when the sun, upon turning out one morning, showed evident signs of having been on a spree all the previous night, being very red in the face, and looking uncommonly cross and snappish; while the sky all about him wore that peculiar brassy appearance which is a sure token of something or other, when observed in the horse latitudes; added to which, a little dyspeptic-looking, Norman arch of a rainbow showed itself close to the horizon, beneath the rising sun.

"I shouldn't be astonished to death, if we caught a pretty considerable long and strong spell of weather, before soon," said Captain Flukes, after a protracted stare at the heavens, and muttering to himself the ancient couplet,

"Rainbow at night, gives sailors delight, Rainbow at morning, gives sailors the warning," he dove down the companion way to have a look at his chart.

For the next half hour or so, there being no perceptible change in the weather, we allowed the schooner to jog along with the light air then stirring, while the mate and most of the foremast hands stood around the cabin table, watching, and making suggestions to the captain, as compasses in hand, he picked out our course and distance on the chart.

"I tell you how it is, Mr. Midships," he exclaimed, throwing down the compasses, and giving his capacious trowsers a hitch up over his hips, "if this here gale o'wind comes out of the south'ard and west'ard, we're jammed like Jackson, with the Guinea coast on two sides of us. If it comes out of any other quarter, it's all right, and we shall have plenty of sea room; but I'm feared it wont. If you ever took notice to it, you are always sure to get the lee shore, whenever there's a chance for a proper bad one."

"True bill," responded the mate, "but there are exceptions; f'instance, when we were round on the Zanguebar coast last voyage, we got a slant at the last pinch of the game, that took us out as clear as a pike staff. However, it would not be a bad idea to get the old dug-out in trim for a snorter, for there's no knowing how soon we may catch it; things work curious sometimes in the low latitudes, 'specially on the woolly coast."

The mate's proposition coincided with our own ideas of the fitness of things, and all hands going to work with a will, we got both anchors over the bow, the jibs and foresail furled, a close reef in the fore-topsail, and a balance reef in the main; by which time it had fallen a stark calm, although the sea continued to rise steadily, while the schooner, without steerage-way on, headed all round the compass.

The few clouds that were visible at sunrise gradually cleared away, and a lurid, brassy haze covered the sky, obscuring the sun and imparting to the smooth, unbroken swell of the waters a sickly purplish hue, that would have looked very beautiful in a painting, but which excited anything but pleasant sensations in the breasts of anxious mariners, dreading an equatorial blow-out. By six bells, the silence of the unbroken calm was interrupted by a low, rushing sound, filling the entire space around us. It was the shrieking of the hurricane careering through the air, high above our heads, while as yet not a breath was stirring on the surface of the ocean. For nearly twenty minutes the mournful sound continued, growing louder and nearer, until at length, a sudden darkening of the air, and a long line of white foam, away in the southwest horizon, announced the coming of the storm from the quarter we had most reason to dread. Our vessel was lying with her head directly towards the point from which the gale was coming, and before any effectual measures could be taken to work her round, we were struck flat aback by the whole fury of the storm. The fore and aft stays tightened and cracked with the tremendous strain, until it seemed almost a miracle that they did not part; the back stays slacked until the lanyards hung in bights over the lower dead eyes; the masts swaying far away aft over the deck, seemed upon the very point of coming down by the run, when the schooner gathering stern way, rushed backwards through the water, the bows rising high in the air, and the quarter settling in the waves in a manner that showed us that we must get her to the wind speedily, or expect to see her go down stern foremost. There can scarcely be a more dangerous position for a vessel, than to get stern way on, in a heavy sea.

"Port your helm—hard a port!" shouted the captain, in a voice of thunder. "Haul in the starboard head braces—brace up the fore, and fore-topsail yards—sharp up, my lads, sharp up—stand by, one of ye there for'ard, to cut the seizing of the fore-topmast headstay!"

This last order, which would have at once relieved the schooner of her masts, was, of course, to be executed only in the last extremity; the other commands were obeyed almost as soon as given. The spars were light, the vessel well manned, and the head yards swung round in a twinkling; the staysail sheet was hauled to port, the main sheet drawn flat aft on the starboard side, and the schooner, after a momentary indecision, fell slowly off on the wind, the fore-top-sail shivering and slatting fearfully for an instant, then catching the gale abaft, filled away, bellying out with a bang, and gathering headway, the schooner's stern rose from its perilous depression in the water, and we flew onward through the boiling foam, with all the safety, if not all the speed, of a full rigged, clipper built porpoise.

"Good enough," exclaimed the captain, rubbing his great fat hands with satisfaction, "we've saved our sticks this time, anyhow. Mr. Midships, keep her a good full and by, so's to make as little lee way as possible, while I go below and take another peep at the Coast Pilot."

The gale continued to increase in violence, and the height of the sea was absolutely appalling; but the schooner being only in ballast trim, rose easily and lightly on the very summit of the waves, without labor, or taking a spoonful of water on her deck, and but that the Bight of Benin terminated in dangerous rocks both on the north and east, we might have lashed the helm a lee, and all hands gone below to sleep in perfect safety. We were a good hundred and fifty miles from the coast, however, and trusted to a change in the direction of the wind, before we could drift that distance, although we were making between six and seven points lee way, and the set of the sea was driving us with tremendous force towards the northeast. Flattering ourselves with the belief that noon would bring a shift of wind, we busied ourselves through the morning watch, lashing the water casks and provisions below, that had broken adrift and shifted over to leeward in the heavy lurches that the vessel was making. But eight bells passed, without bringing any signs of the wished for change. The same ghastly sky lowered above us, while the gale continued on the increase, singing through our rigging with a shrill, ominous sound; and far as the eye could reach over the raging waters, the angry, leaden waves leaped fiercely up, and with eager, hurrying motion, rushed towards us, breaking with a prolonged roar beneath our counter, and throwing the stinging spoon-drift in our faces, as if in defiance and threatening. As the afternoon wore on, we began to experience not a little anxiety as to the termination of our cruise. That it would be impossible for the craft to drift through the night, as she had all day, without fetching up against something harder than salt water, was evident to all. Indeed, it would not only have been running into the very jaws of death, but absolutely jumping down his throat.

"What d'ye think, Mr. Midships, will the old boat bear any more cloth?" asked the captain, looking anxiously to windward, and at our swaying spars.

"She's got to bear it, whether she will or no," responded the mate, resolutely. "We must claw out of this hole somehow, and we might as well lose our spars before we go on to the rocks, as after."

"That's gospel," returned the captain. "Shake a reef out of the main, and drop the foresail."

This was a work requiring careful management, for aside from the danger of the masts being at once carried over the side by the increased strain, the schooner was very light, and might at any moment be shoved keel out. Slowly, and one by one, the reef points were cast off from the main, the earings slacked off gradually, to avoid a sudden strain, and the sail hoisted. The schooner feeling the increase of sail aft, without a corresponding trim forward, very narrowly escaped broaching to; but by carrying a large weather helm, we managed to keep her away until the fore tack was boarded, and the sheet hauled aft, when bringing her again to the wind, she laid over to the work, and began drawing to windward quite respectably, considering her scant canvass, our wake being now well on the quarter, whereas before it had been very little abaft the beam. But notwithstanding the increased spread of canvass, we were still making large lee way; our reefed fore course and mainsail, being all that we could with any degree of safety show to the breeze, were almost wholly becalmed under the lee of the monstrous waves, as we settled in the trough, and almost driven from the bolt ropes, upon catching the gale as we rose upon the crest of the billows.

Thus far, we had been running with our larboard tacks aboard, heading, when jammed on the wind, about north-by-west, making our true course, with allowance for lee way and what she fell off, nearly nor'-west-by-north; a course which was rapidly drawing us in towards the coast of Dahomey.

"What's your opinion now, Mr. Midships?" asked Captain Flukes, as the sun, looking red and angry, disappeared below the misty horizon.

"Why," responded the mate, with a doubtful shake of the head, "there is but one thing we can do, and that is to go about on the other tack and stand more to the south'ard; if we can only weather Cape Formosa, we could make a long stretch to the east'ard, into the bight of Biafra, and perhaps get under the lee of Fernando Po, between the islands and the old Calabar coast."

"Yes, that's all plain talk enough," replied Captain Flukes, pettishly, "but how the deuce are we going to do it? The schooner hasn't got sail enough on to go in stays, and if we undertake to wear, we shall be pooped by one of those big combers, as sure as taxes, and then, sir, your wife will be a widder in the twinkling of a catharpin's leg."

"Pooh!" ejaculated the mate, somewhat contemptuously; "don't give yourself any uneasiness about Mrs. Midships; she is a lady who can stand being made a widow of, quite a number of times without any very serious consequences. And suppose we do take a sea that knocks us down among the ribs and trucks of Davy's locker a little sooner than we expected, why, that's what the owners pay us for, aint it? If the schooner hasn't got sail enough on, just put it on, that's all. For my part, I say tack and bear up to the south'ard at any risk, if you don't I shall desert the craft, and paddle ashore on the sheet anchor."

Captain Flukes was as brave a man as you will often find, but he was very cautious, almost too much so at times, while Mr. Midships, on the contrary, was a man of prompt action; when he had once made up his mind as to what was proper to be done, he did it without hesitation. And upon this occasion, the captain, either stung by the tone of his remarks, or catching his spirit, fortified himself with a big hunk of tobacco, and hailed the fore-castle.

"How is that fore-topsail, boys?"

"Furled with a close reef, sir," shouted one of the men.

"Well, lay aloft and loose it."

The sail was dropped to leeward and the clew hauled chock home to the sheave hole, without any other effect than to cause the schooner to lay over still further to starboard, but no sooner was the gasket cast off from the weather yard-arm, than with a shivering crash the sail was torn from the bolt ropes, and disappeared in the darkness to leeward.

"What d'ye think now, Mr. Midships?" asked the captain, somewhat triumphantly.

"I think we've lost a good fore-topsail, and will have to heave in stays as we are," coolly responded the mate.

"We can but try," said the captain, doubtfully, then raising his voice: "Ready about, there, for'ard!"

"Ready about, sir!" responded the men, springing to their stations and laying down the rigging clear for running.

"Keep her off a couple of points and give her a good headway!" he continued, to the man at the wheel.

"Keep her off it is, sir!" replied the man, easing her half a dozen spokes, and the schooner taking the wind further aft, darted through the water with considerably accelerated velocity.

"Are you all ready there for'ard, Mr. Midships?" he screamed, using his fist for a trumpet.

"All ready, sir!" screamed back the mate, from his station on the fore-castle.

"Put your helm down, my son!"

"Hard down, sir!" replied the helmsman, with a rapid revolution of the wheel.

"Hard a lee—co—I!" roared the captain, dwelling long and loudly on the double vowel, as is the invariable practice with all ship masters with whom I have ever been acquainted; from which a landsman might be led to suppose that a ship would utterly refuse to come about, if the word was pronounced in any other way.

"Hard a lee!" responded Mr. Midships, emphasizing the first word, after the manner of all mates.

The schooner being under good headway, came promptly to, taking the head sails aback, with the wind dead ahead, and everything seemed to indicate that she would go in stays finely; but just at the critical moment, when the order was being given to rise tacks and sheets, the crest of a broken wave came roaring and tumbling down upon us, striking on the bluff of the bow, flooding the fore-castle, carrying away the fore-staysail, and effectually deadening our headway. With a shake, the schooner paused in her course, neither falling off, nor coming to, and gradually gathering stern way, slid backwards through the foam.

"In irons, by Jupiter!" exclaimed the mate, in a tone of perplexity and alarm.

"Missed stays, or I'm a heathen!" ejaculated the captain, excitedly. "Round in on the head braces—slack off the main sheet—put your helm amidships!"

There was no chance to obey these orders, however. A monstrous wave rose black and threatening upon our larboard bow; higher and higher it rose, gathering strength as it swelled upward, completely bocalming the schooner under its lee, until to our excited imaginations it almost seemed to reach the clouds, and we really longed to have it break and do its worst. At length it came. Toppling over from its perpendicular height, it fell with a dull, heavy roar, upon the deck, crashing through the bulwarks and burying everything deep in the weltering vortex. Every timber in the vessel's hull moaned and quivered, as though with fear, while the escaping air through the openings in the deck, was like a prolonged and mournful sigh. For many seconds it was a matter of uncertainty whether the vessel was going down or not, and the temptation was strong for the men to quit their hold upon what seemed a sinking ship, and struggle to gain the surface. At last, with a shake and a groan, the schooner freed herself from the mass of water, and darted off before the wind. We had been turned completely round, by the force of the wave.

The mate had saved himself by clinging to one of the windlass bits, and, as half stunned and gasping for breath he struggled to his feet, all eyes were turned to him, as the most reliable man in such an extremity.

"What say, Captain Flukes, shall we wear round on the starboard tack?" he vociferated, brushing the salt spray from his eyes.

There was no answer.

"Where's Captain Flukes?" he exclaimed, earnestly.

"He's for'ard, sir," replied the helmsman, who had maintained his position, by being lashed to the wheel stanchion, and was the only man aft.

"No he aint! Jump down in the cabin, one of ye, and see if he's there."

"There's nobody there, and the cabin is more'n half full of water," was the reply.

"He's overboard! He's gone!" was the exclamation that broke from all at this announcement.

"Who saw him last?" inquired the mate, gloomily.

"I saw him standing abaft the mainmast on the hen coop, when the sea boarded us. I caught a glimpse of the coop going over the starboard rail, a minute after, and supposed the captain had gone for'ard," replied the helmsman.

"There are just two things we can do, boys," said the mate, after a short pause. "The captain probably fastened himself to one of the coops, as they went over together; we can either make an effort to pick him up—in which case we shall probably go on to the rocks, or we can claw to windward, and do the best we can for ourselves, though there's a slim chance any way. What d'ye say?"

There was a moment of indecision among the men. At length the carpenter broke the silence.

"It seems rather too bad to leave poor old fatty Flukes, without even having so much as a try for him."

A general murmur of approbation followed this remark.

"Talk enough, boys; if that's your wish, we'll see what we can do," said the mate, evidently much satisfied with our decision. "Stand to the braces, and let us get her on the wind again."

Since being boarded by the sea, the schooner had been going off like a shot, directly before the wind, and it was no easy matter to get her to it again, without shipping another, which might be even more disastrous; but by the more skilful management or better luck of the mate, we finally worked round to the starboard tack, and ran back as nearly as we could judge, towards the spot where the captain had disappeared. By this time it had grown intensely dark, making it difficult to distinguish any object at more than the schooner's length from us, while the wind and sea continued to increase in height and violence. Two or three successful tacks brought us near to where we supposed the captain must have drifted, in the event of his still being above water, which was far from probable, in such a sea. All hands were now upon the lookout, at both mastheads, on the forecabin, and on the quarter, while the mate—who took all the blame of the captain's loss upon himself, as though the storm had nothing to do with it—paced the deck with agitated steps, glancing anxiously in all directions, and constantly repeating his injunctions to the men to keep a bright lookout. That there was soon to be a change in the weather now became apparent. The wind which had all day been a steady gale, now came in violent squalls accompanied with rain, with short lulls between.

"I think we must be very nearly on the spot now, Chips, don't you?" he asked of the carpenter who stood by his side, leaning over the lee rail. But what's that?" he exclaimed, with great earnestness, gazing wildly to leeward. "Main top there—fo'kettle, do you see anything?"

"Nothing, sir," was the reply from both lookouts. But the mate in great excitement continued to strain his eyes through the darkness. At this moment occurred a short lull in the breaking hurricane, and a low, faint sound, very low and indistinct, but inexpressibly mournful, came in a tremulous murmur to our ears.

"Do you hear anything?" he asked, in an agitated voice.

"Nothing, sir, but the sound of the wind and the waves," replied the man from the top.

Again the long continued, fluttering, mournful sound.

"Do you hear that? Fo'kettle—main-top, don't you hear something? Good God, are you all deaf?"

"I thought I heard a distant hail come up against the wind," replied the lookout on the forecabin.

"That's no human hail," said the carpenter, with an ominous shake of the head, "that is the sound of broken water moaning on the reefs."

"I fear you are right," returned the mate. "He could not have drifted so far to leeward, as where that sound comes from, and if it is a reef, it's all up with us, without a change of wind."

"Something on the weather bow!" sung out the man on the forecabin.

"Breakers broad on the lee beam!" hailed the tops, almost in the same breath.

The cry of breakers, usually so startling to the ears of weary mariners on a lee shore, was almost wholly unheeded, and all hands rushed to windward to see what the object might be that had been discovered on the weather bow. Igniting a blue light by a smart rap on the weather rail, the mate held it high above his head, throwing a lurid glare far over the toppling crests of the black and surging waves. At the distance of about a hundred fathoms, some dark object was drifting slowly past us, and as the light increased its brilliancy, we distinctly made it out to be one of our hencoops, to which a human form was clinging, apparently in an exhausted condition. It was too far to windward to reach it on that tack, however.

"Ready about!" shouted the mate.

The men sprang to the braces, the wind favored us, and never was the schooner hove in stays in shorter time. Upon this tack we weathered the coop; but it would not answer to run too close, for to have been dashed by the waves against the schooner's side, would have been certain destruction. All hands were stationed at short intervals, along the lee rail, with lines in their hands, while the blue lights succeeded each other as soon as one was consumed.

A few moments brought the floating object on our lee bow. A line was thrown from the fore-castle and fell short, another and another with like ill success; at length, one thrown from the quarter passed over the coop; the captain made a feeble effort, but was too much exhausted to pass it round his body. He was drifting rapidly astern.

"Stand by to haul in on this line!" shouted the mate, passing the end of a studding-sail tack round his waist, and springing from the taffrail. A moment of intense suspense followed, as he struck and disappeared beneath the water. Presently rising to the surface, a few vigorous strokes brought him alongside the coop, and the bight of a rope was made fast around the almost inanimate body.

"Haul in!" he screamed. And the next minute they were hoisted over the rail.

The captain was borne to the cabin and placed in his berth. The motion revived him.

"Never mind me, boys," he said, seeing us grouped about him. "I'm all right enough, only a little water-logged or so. You'd best look out for the schooner."

And it was certainly time that we did so, for upon going on deck the sight that presented itself was absolutely appalling. We had drifted to within half a mile of the reef, over which the waves were breaking with tremendous fury, throwing the spray high into the air, forming a long, unbroken wall of ghastly white foam, at least sixty feet in height, with a roar like nothing else in nature.

The hurricane had entirely passed away; the clouds cleared from the heavens, leaving a bright starlight, and it fell a flat calm; but the monstrous waves which still felt the force of the gale, and would not so readily subside, were driving us swiftly in toward the rocks.

"Are the anchors all clear there for'ard?" the mate hailed from the quarter deck.

"All clear, sir," answered the carpenter, who had charge of the fore-castle.

"Let go to starboard!"

The shank painter and ring-stopper were cast off, and the heavy mass of iron fell with a plunge into the water, drawing the chain cable like lightning round the barrel of the windlass and through the hawse-pipe, a stream of sparks following, until the last link surged round the windlass and the strain was brought upon the clinch.

"Does she hold?" asked the mate, as she pitched, bows under, with the sudden check.

The carpenter placed his hand upon the bits, but the dull, tremulous jump, jump, jump of the cable showed that we were yet moving.

"No, sir—she drags," was the reply.

"Let go to port!" returned the mate.

Another plunge, and another long continued rumble of the cable followed the order; but the chain passed out less rapidly, until when about two-thirds the length had passed over the windlass, it stopped, and was only taken by jerks in short lengths as the vessel rose on the swell; even this stopped presently, leaving a whole range of cable lying slack abaft the windlass.

There was now no longer any danger, although the schooner buried herself clear to the main-mast at every wave; but the ground tackle held, the sea was falling, and the sky was serene. There was no necessity of a watch that night, and worn out and exhausted we sought our hammocks, which we lost no time in stowing full of extra quality snoozing.

THE CALLIOPE.

This steam musical instrument, it seems, produced a tremendous impression when it was first started on board a boat on the Hudson. It shrieked out "Yankee Doodle" and "Hail Columbia," so that they were heard for miles. Its effects on board of another boat some half a mile off are described as both appalling and amusing. One lady fainted dead away; others screamed and stopped their ears. An Italian singer attempted to throw himself overboard, and was only saved from destruction by the combined efforts of the captain and clerk of the boat. The negro firemen threw themselves into indescribable contortions, while an unhappy dog rushed about among the passengers, with his tail between his legs, setting up the most dismal howls in expectation of some horrible calamity. The sturgeons rushed out of the water, and threw a vast number of summersets on the surface, wagging their tails, as if they alone of all the auditors enjoyed it. But people will get used to it in time. We have no doubt it will be introduced into every steam navy in the world, supplying the place of marine bands at a great saving of expense. But, seriously, an ingenious mechanic of this city has invented a small machine, which, without any human agency, blows several bugle-calls, producing very pure and even pleasing tones. At any rate, the calliope is certainly a great curiosity.—Flag.

A man's worth is estimated in this world according to his conduct.

REMEMBERED.

BY MRS. D. G. ELDER.

Thou art remembered at the twilight hour,
 When I am gazing at the star-gemmed sky,
 When most I feel affection's thrilling power,
 When pearly teardrops moisten my dark eye;
 'Tis then I think of dear ones far away,
 Then hollower thoughts with all my feelings blend,
 And when alone in solitude I pray,
 I breathe thy name in every prayer, my friend.

Thou canst not dream of the calm, deep devotion
 That forms a part of such a heart as mine;
 Full many a tender thought and fond emotion,
 Full many a tear, is trembling on its shrine.
 Oft, when I've whispered of the dear departed,
 So early called to heaven's fair home above,
 I've crushed the teardrops that would fain have started,
 And smiling turned my longing eyes above.

Thou art remembered with a deep affection,
 As pure and hallowed as a sister's love;
 How oft I've craved our Father's kind protection,
 How many a faith-winged prayer I've urged above;
 Deep, deep within my heart thou'rt fondly cherished,
 No common friendship binds my heart to thine,
 'Tis soul-felt, only with my life 'twill perish,
 To be renewed beyond the shores of time.

Thou art remembered with a silent yearning,
 Friend of my childhood's bright and sunny years;
 When from false friends I have been proudly turning,
 I've dreamed of thee mid all my doubts and fears.
 Shouldst thou prove false to friendship so devoted,
 One pang perchance this wounded heart might feel;
 Then would I crush each hope on which I've doted,
 Then woman's pride will prove a steadfast shield.

THE BITER BIT.

BY FRANCIS W. BUTMANN.

It is something over four years now since Bitemely sent me on my tom-fool's errand. I said then, that next year my pretty cousin was coming from Maryland, and after a dreary winter, in April come she did. I don't know if I've mentioned that I live, when at home, with an aunt of mine, five or six miles out of the city, in a delightful old country house, full of must and spiders. The house is mine, but the servants and our tempers belong to my aunt, who, by the way, "exercises" them well. A pond is situated at the foot of the garden, and many is the time Bitemely and I have angled with wonderful success in its waters, I hinting of better fishing by-and-by. I say Bitemely and I, because it is not to be supposed that I quarrelled with that gentleman; on the contrary, better friends than ever, he almost made my house his home, the remainder of that summer and fall, till Aunt Jane was quite put to her trumps; and as my business only demanded a few hours' attention daily, and Bitemely invariably closed his office early, we became almost inseparable. I really couldn't say it was intentionally that, thrusting on my smoking-cap, or poking my feet into my slippers, I always deferentially addressed my invisible cousin Mary, whose handiwork they were, in a manner that at first surprised Bitemely, but into which he gradually fell himself whenever he leaned his head back in his arm-chair, whose sumptuous velvet covering had itself been wrought by Mary's fairy finger-tips.

"My dear, be careful of that lampshade," my aunt would say, if she saw either of the bachelor legs tending as if they would very much like to make a resting-place on the table. "I should feel so sad to tell Mary her pretty drawing was soiled." In short, my cousin Mary became one of my Penates, and when I told Bitemely that she was coming in the flesh in April, and perhaps he would see her, I noticed him pull up his shirt collar and glance at the looking-glass with his most irresistible air. Now I'm not a baby myself—my last birthday was my thirty-fifth,—but as to being overcoming to my pretty cousin, I should as soon have thought of prinking for the Princess Royal; and as for Bitemely, he is at least a half dozen years ahead of me. Nevertheless, when May Day should come, Mary would enter on her twenty-second year and a handsome property—of which facts Bitemely was quite aware—and she preferred celebrating that day in company with her own aunt and her own aunt's nephew than away among strangers; for I have not stated that she was an orphan. In fact, I am not quite Mary's cousin; she is my aunt's niece and I am my aunt's husband's nephew; that's the relationship.

My buggy is a fine little vehicle, a little too little for two persons, as I found late that afternoon, when one of them is a vessel of wine measure pipe, tub, puncheon, hogshead, barrel, or anything else that is hooped, and the other has to sit somewhere in the region of the hub of the wheel; but one can forgive a beauty for following the fashion, and hoops have been in, gone out, and come again since then. Thus with Tim lumbering after, with the baggage in a wagon, I drove my pretty cousin towards home. Just as we rattled off our last pavement, I saw Bitemely. "How are you, old fellow?" said I, looking triumphantly. "Coming out, to-night?" Bitemely's hat went up perpendicularly about half a yard, and came down diagonally a yard and a half before it alighted on the excruciatingly bowed head. "What exquisitely high bred gentleman is that?" Mary ought to have asked in order to meet Bitamsly's expectation; but, on the contrary, merely remarking, "Bless my heart! what a guy!" she rattled on in her own delightful way about everything in general.

All her vacations, from her twelfth to her twentieth year, had been spent with Aunt Jane and me, and a year's distribution of herself among her intimate acquaintances having passed, she had decided to spend the residue of her days, till death or a husband should remove her, with us, her only relatives.

"O, but my sands are running out, Joe," said she. "I suffer a depression—an empty, deadening feeling. I am pining slowly; my digestion is dreadful; I shall certainly either die or go crazy"—I looked in amazement at the plump, rosy girl, who sank back in the carriage,—“if you don't put this nag to his paces,” she continued; “for I haven't tasted a morsel since six this morning!”

Under such a dreadful penalty we cleared the ground at railroad speed.

"Good gracious!" said Aunt Jane, as Mary, running up the steps, entered the dark hall with extended arms and a mouth puckered up for kissing, preparatory to an onslaught on my aunt. "Good gracious! how do you think I can ever get at you, my dear? I might as well try to kiss a man looking out of the top of a balloon! Why in the world you've got so much in the way of skirt and so little in the way of bonnet, I can't see. I can't kiss you—it's of no use trying!"

"O, it can be done, ma'am," said Mary; and twisting off the butterfly she wore on her "back hair," she rushed at Aunt Jane and demonstrated how, while smothering the affectionate little woman in kisses. "There, sir," she said, turning to me, "I dare say you'd like me to perform the same operation on your blushing cheeks, but I sha'n't!" And now going round and shaking hands with Mrs. Archer, the cook, Isabel, said lady's grandchild, a damsel of fifteen, Joshuay and Isaiyeh, who worked the farm, she made herself generally merry and agreeable. "Now, Mrs. Archer," said Mary, a little 'summat' to eat, do—I'm ravenous! There's that canary piping up over the door; I noticed it when I came in, and if I hadn't been afraid the feathers would stick in my throat, I should have devoured it long ago!" And she plunged after Mrs. Archer into the buttery. "O, here's just the thing," cried Mary, on tiptoe, peering over the shelves. "A chicken pie, as I live! Prepare fingers to play the shovel! Do you suppose I am going to wait for a knife and fork?"

But Mrs. Archer had taken down the pie, and holding it ominously on one side, pointed to a vast extent of its uncovered surface where the pastry had been delicately picked away.

"It never wor the cat," said Mrs. Archer, shaking her head. "Joshuay, have you been to this pie?"

"No," sang Joshuay, through his nose from the kitchen, "I haint, mum."

"Isaiyeh, then, have you been to this pie?"

"No, mum," shouted Isaiyeh, with a little variation, "I haint."

"Isabel! Isabel!" screamed Mrs. Archer, "have you been to this pie? Yes, you have! I know your long, slim finger. It's you, miss! you go right to-bade—not a mouthful of supper shall you have this night!"

"And meantime," said Mary, who had been murmuring that nature couldn't sustain it any longer, "I'm starving. Here, Mrs. Archer, give me the pie. Joe, give me a fork! Isabel, help yourself to a spoon. There now, little girl, we'll finish it together. You needn't wait, Joe; you wont get any. I'm not quite an anaconda that you need to stare as if I were swallowing a goat whole with the horns!"

I beat a retreat to Joshuay's domains and consulted with him quite a time, concerning the crops, etc. Returning, I stopped at the battery door; Mary had finished the pie, and was standing up, imbibing a glass of foaming milk, while, as if pretending to pick up a fork, Mrs. Archer stooped down to the floor.

"Sweet, pretty stuff that of your gownd, light and delicate like, feels soft, too," said Mrs. Archer, as she took the hem between her fingers to examine the texture; "raal putty, I declare! I spose you gave as much as four-six a yard, for that, now," and lifting the hem the least in the world, she obtained a glimpse of the wondrous hoops and dropped it. "Ahem," said Mrs. Archer. "Yes, I thought so. You wear one of them parrot cages, do you? Well—I suppose now we shall have our Isabel cutting up all the clothes lines to rig herself out. The hencoop that's broke and put away in the barn would do every bit as well."

"Don't get into a puncheon when a barrel will hold yer, grandmar!" suggested the daring Isabel.

"I thought I sent you to-bade, miss," was her response. And in a state of virtuous indignation at "them new-fangled fashings," Mrs. Archer sent Isabel away leaving Mary to her milk.

That evening we were all sitting in the garden chairs on the terrace, when Bitamsly cantered up, and giving his horse to Tim, joined us. After a repetition of the afternoon's bow, he tried to feel at home, but evidently didn't succeed till taking a seat below us, he surveyed my plump cousin's beauty, now considerably enhanced in the splendor lent it by the rising moon. Before midnight, Bitemely, it was plain to see, had plunged in reveries, and was over head and ears in the flood of the river Amaris. Indeed, as he confidentially informed me the next day, he dreamed of drowning all night, and of being interminably hauled out by the ears by my angelic cousin in the form of a pair of pincers.

Thus days and weeks flew by, till June slid in the gates of the year, and pleasure parties, where my aunt and cousin, Bitemely and myself, were the principal parties, made a perfect fete champêtre of the summer; during which, it may be believed, Bitemely was by no means slow in evincing his devotion to Mary, who, skilfully parrying every open attack, prevented any proposals from him, and always treated him as if he were a harlequin who amused her, or an amiable child whom she ought to amuse.

One evening he and myself were strolling along, when a light figure tripping a few rods in advance on the other side of the fence, caught our eyes. It was Mary. Bitemely darted forward to assist her in crossing the fence, but as I caught her eye with its laughing appeal, I don't know how it was I reached the point first, lifted her across, and took her bundle from her. She was going to Mrs. Sprague's, one of the poor of the parish, and we accompanied her.

"Mrs. Sprague's son," said Mary, gaily, to hide her well-doing under an assumption of nonsense, "has been a convict in the State prison for six years, and was just let out this afternoon. I thought I'd like to see a real, live State prison bird for once, and make it a little pleasant to him to be good, and so forth, you know, by a tart and some sandwiches and tea—you understand!"

Yes, kind-hearted little woman, I understand very well; but Bitemely, who was always rather tight at a bargain, seemed to think it an unnecessary expense, while Mary, with an "O, no matter," and much the same manner as that with which she would pat a great Newfoundland, took no further notice of his remarks. As we passed Mrs. Sprague's window, natural curiosity turned our heads that way. The table was already laid, and the family were sitting down to tea. As they drew up their chairs, the recent convict pushed his back with a scrape, stood upright, and shutting his eyes with the tightest squeeze, uttered a long and elaborate blessing. Opening the eyes with an effort at the close, he glanced round.

"Well," said he, with considerable exultation, "reckon ye didn't expect that from this quarter! Well, it's true—the place which I come from is the place for moral rectitude and no mistake! If we had short commons, we got moral rectitude, which is as good as bread and fat, and what's better'n that?" After which poetical essay, he proceeded to bestow a liberal allowance of the last named articles upon himself.

Mary, who was already intimate with all the ragamuffins of the village, softly opened the door and beckoned Mrs. Sprague out.

"Here, Mrs. Sprague," said she, "pretend you forgot these, and go to the closet and appear to take them out, so that it will appear pleasant to your son; and when you have finished tea, I'd like to see you again, please. We'll wait here."

The old woman thanked her warmly as she took the dainties, and went in. Meantime, a little Sprague, who couldn't sit at table because there wasn't room, and who entertained fears of the tart, started a mighty bawling that quite nipped all Bitemely's attempts at conversation; whereupon, after considerable meditation, Bitemely put his hand in his pocket, and pulling out a cent as if it were a tooth, handed it to the youngster, who, delighted at such, to him, fabulous wealth, suspended operations in a state of ecstatic silence. In about half an hour, Mrs. Sprague returned.

"I've brought some shoes to see if they'll fit you," said Mary, as with her own hands she tried on several pairs till they arrived at some which Mrs. Sprague pronounced "cumfble," and Mary rose. As we stepped out, Bitemely lingered behind—"probably," whispered Mary, "to bestow some greater charity." But alas! low as he spoke, his voice was audible.

"I'm looking for a piece of money, a small coin, madam, that I let your little boy take; has he got it?"

The child put the cent in his mouth and his hands behind him, shaking his head very emphatically.

"Come, sonny—that's a good sonny," said Bitemely; but sonny was not to be coaxed.

"But I must have it, little boy," continued Bitemely. "A cent spoils the face of a dollar."

The indignant mother, seizing a shoulder, shook her child violently, determined the cent should leave his mouth one way or the other; and fortunately for him, it rolled from his lips to the floor. Bitemely picked it up, coolly, and dropped it in his pocket, pleased to hear the welcome jingle, and rejoined us.

Mary and I stared at each other.

"I hope it don't burn your pocket," said she.

"O, no," he returned, "not in the least. A penny saved is a penny gained, you know—and besides, my pockets are lined with leather."

"And your heart with something harder," muttered she, but he didn't hear her, and politely offered his arm.

As we passed the outer door, Mrs. Sprague, holding back her dress that she might admire her new shoes, was displaying them to advantage, while applying their extremities to the sides of a yelping canine.

"Always the way," said Mary. "I never gave her a pair of shoes in my life but she immediately went to work kicking that poor dog. I should think he'd hate the smell of leather, too!"

It was a midsummer night, and the bells were ringing nine. We had nearly reached home, when we came where four roads met, and a little brook and bridge intersected them. Here some extraordinary operations appeared to be going on. Miss Isabel Archer, with a napkin spread on the ground, illuminated in the centre by a lantern, and on which were two plates with a piece of bread in each, and a cup of tea, was mumbling a rhyme of mysterious import, while winding a ball of yarn, one end of which was in the brook:

"Whoever is my true love to be Let him come wind this yarn for me,
Come eat this bread and drink this tea."

"If she hasn't got my purse silk winding there!" whispered Mary. "Mr. Bitemalsy, if you'll go pick up the end in the brook, I'll knit you a purse this very evening! And Mr. Bitemalsy, you said you wanted this rose. You may have it if you'll stoop down, as you go to the brook, and see what's in the plates—I can't imagine."

Bitemalsy sprang up obediently.

"She's trying a project," said Mary, almost dead, as she declared, with laughter, "to see who'll marry her—the little toad! O, isn't it fun?"

As for Bitemalsy, stooping down to view the contents of the plates, the lantern light suddenly gleamed on his face, appearing out of the darkness, and gave it a ghostly effect. But poor Isabel! Although she had been hoping for somebody's appearance, this was too much, and with open eyes and open mouth, uplifted hands and hair like "quills upon the fretful porcupine," she stood stone still. Running along, Bitemalsy seized the other end of the fabulous purse silk, and as soon as Miss Archer felt the pull upon it, she left all, and with a series of voluminous shrieks, turned about, and scampered home as fast as her long legs could carry her. "O, won't I shake her!" said Mary; but I never heard that she did.

Bitemalsy went into the city, as we thought, the next morning, and I took Mary out in the skiff for a jaunt on the little island in the pond; she to procure some specimens of wild flowers, and I for the pleasure of giving her pleasure. What was our surprise, then, to behold Mr. Bitemalsy sitting in a lovesome attitude on the bank and tearing the little willow stems.

"He looks as if he had better wear the willow than tear it," whispered Mary.

But Bitemalsy's face grew radiant as he beheld her, and immediately he left his employment. Wandering with them over the island, I at last threw myself on the sward beneath a bowery thicket, while Mary strayed round at no great distance, followed assiduously by Bitemalsy. They soon were beyond hearing; but after a time, evidently unconscious that they had returned to the same spot, I heard their voices approaching the place where I, without intending it, was quite hidden.

"Ah, Miss Mary," said Bitemalsy, "I must tell you how perfectly charming you are!"

"Well," said Mary, laying a gentian root on one side, "tell away, how perfectly charming am I!"

This was rather a damper, but after a while the swain began again:

"I cannot repress my emotions. You must allow me to beg you to listen."

"I'm all attention," said Mary. "Hand me that little trowel first, if you please. There—now!"

"The sight of you," said he, making another vain attempt, "fills me with the warmest admiration."

"I wonder where Joe is!"

"Fills me," reiterated Bitemalsy, "with the warmest admiration. I—"

"I'm glad to hear it," interrupted my pretty cousin. "There never was a woman yet who didn't like to be admired, though some are ridiculous enough to be particular who the admirer is."

Bitemalsy took this as encouraging.

"You are glad of it!" he ejaculated. "O, Miss Mary, you have made me the happiest of men! I love—"

Here I thought Mr. Bitemalsy was going a little too far, and announcing my vicinity by a yawn and a tumultuous fit of coughing, I appeared before Bitemalsy could declare whom he loved.

"Fly in your throat, Cousin Joe!" asked

Mary, whose face was fast losing the surprise called forth by Bitemely's remarks.

"Not at all," I replied; "one on your hook, though."

"I'm not angling," said Mary.

"No, but angle-worming," I returned, as she untwisted one of those delightful creatures from her fingers.

"I'm sure," retorted Mary, pouting, "I have not hung out any bait!"

"No. You've caught your fish," I laughed; for Bitemely was tumbling down the bank to unloose the boat.

"Don't let him say anything more, Joe," pleaded Mary. And acting upon this hint, I contrived to allow Bitemely no corner for a sentence till we reached home, where he found a letter, announcing that a valuable tract of land in Michigan was about to find a sheriff's sale, owing to the fact that his agent had absconded without seeing fit to pay the taxes, and his own presence was needed in that quarter. Thereupon bidding Mary an overwhelming farewell, with a smile of ineffable pity that she must endure the loss of his company, Bitemely, who had been made—Heaven alone knew how—"the happiest of men," departed.

Now I had never fallen in love with Mary myself, that I knew of, and so when I found another man who had made himself so foolish, I at first wondered, and then thought, what if Mary had accepted him, how I should like that. It is unnecessary to state the process by which I arrived at the conclusion that I shouldn't like it at all, and that—that—it would be pleasant to have Mary always here; but it never occurred to me to ask her about it. By-and-by—it was dusk now—the subject of my thoughts appeared on the grassy terrace above, and then danced down the garden, and taking my arm, she gently drew the cigar from my fingers and threw it away.

"Well, Mary," said I, "is my pretty cousin to be merged into Mrs. —"

"Nonsense!" she cried. "But what shall I do? The wretch has gone away thinking I've accepted him, and I never had such an idea!"

"I don't see myself what—unless you undeceive him!"

"And how shall I do that?"

"Well—really—"

"I don't see how," said Mary, "unless—" and dropping my arm, she turned round and confronted me, "unless—I marry you, Joe!"

"Will you, Mary, will you?" uttered I, but my cousin's boldness was all gone in an instant; and as for the rest—find out, reader, if you can.

"Aunt Jane," said I, when I went in, "how should you fancy to keep Mary always here after three weeks from this day?"

"Ah!" said my aunt. "Why, really—you don't—it can't—Mary? I—marry her, Joseph?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Marry her in three weeks?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Mary, is he in earnest?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Why, to be sure you don't need anything particular, the way most girls do, in the way of new clothing, a—what do you call it?—trousseau. You've got enough; so you don't want six months to sew yourself to death in. But, heavens and earth! how can things be got ready in three weeks?"

"It will be nice and quiet, auntie," said Mary. "Only the minister and a half dozen friends."

"Well, my dears," said my aunt, who could not be gotten to give her consent outright to what was none of her business, "suit yourselves and you'll suit me. If you've no objections, I'm sure I needn't have any."

As I am not writing "Letters to a young man on the art of courtship," I shall not detail the proceedings of those three weeks. But at last the eventful sunshiny morning dawned. The company, who exceeded the original half dozen by some fifty or so, were in the drawing-room; the minister had arrived, and I was taking a settler in the way of a cigar, when a light foot ran up the staircase, and Bitemely, in full toilet (in which, by the way, he had always taken pains to present himself to Mary), entered my sanctum.

"How d'ye do?" said he, in a delighted way.

"How's Mary? Couldn't see her anywhere when I came in. What in the deuce is all that row in the parlor for?"

"O, some of my good aunt's works," said I.

"Come, I guess we'll go down;" for I saw my aunt beckoning me. "Mary'll be along in a minute." And we sauntered down together.

As we opened one of the drawing-room doors, my aunt and Mary entered at the opposite one. Bitemely started terribly. Mary was all covered up with lace, and her head was converted into an apparent basket of white morning glories, which looked decidedly as if they ought to wilt at this hour of day—but couldn't, being made of white satin. My aunt hovered like a little gray boat on Mary's Niagara-esque flow of drapery behind her, although the fashion had considerably collapsed; but if ever any man was brute enough to criticise his bride's appearance, yet him be hung, as I was; for meeting Mary half way, I slipped my head into the noose, and was incontinently swung off.

Bitemaly, astonished, aghast, shivering and silently raging, had fallen back, but was now pushed forward by the crowd behind, who rushed up to pour out their stale congratulations. Apparently without knowing what he did, he dived at my hand and brought it up. "I—I—I—" said he; but I finished the sentence for him, by adding—"had better seek health and solitude in the wilds of Scatuskykillcat!"

I noticed, shortly after my marriage, that Isabel had disappeared. She was sent to school, as Mrs. Archer told my aunt; and when, three years after, a wedding card, said to belong to one Bitemaly, was read, there was neatly engraved in one corner thereof, "Miss Isabel Archer."

Mrs. Bitemaly, who looks, as my wife declares, half the time pinched to death, and the other half frightened to death, declares that to the day of her death, she shall believe in projects tried on a midsummer night—I don't know whether she wishes she hadn't tried it or not.

THUMBS BEFORE KNIVES.

There was one, a girl of some eighteen years of age, who might have sat for a Hebe; she came to the river-side, bearing on her head a species of tub, such as the washerwomen in Brittany use for kneeling in while they wash. She stopped close to me and put her tub down, which was filled with enormous slices of black bread flanked by huge lumps of butter. She then sat on one of the stepping-stones, within a few of me. Thus far all her motions were graceful; but alas! how small a thing destroys sentiment! Seizing one of the black wedges in her delicate white hand (blanched by washing), she plastered one side with butter, using her right thumb for the operation, and handed it to one of her companions. In this manner she dealt with all the slices, distributing them to the women around her, who seemed to relish them not the less for the absence of a knife.—Weld's Vacation in Brittany.

A GREAT ADVANTAGE.

The nurse of a Parisian lady fell ill, recently, and her mistress gave orders for a physician to be sent for.

"But, madame, they are so dear!" remonstrated the woman.

"No matter, my poor girl," replied the lady, "my own physician must see you at once."

"Then perhaps madame subscribes for a doctor as we do?"

"Subscribe! What do you mean?" asked the mistress.

"Why, madame, you see at home," exclaimed the girl, "we pay twelve francs a year for the whole family; and one year there was a great deal of sickness in our house, and I assure you, madame, I had a bad typhoid fever for nothing!" Saturday Courier.

ONWARD AND UPWARD!

BY GULA MEREDITH.

Though dark be the tempests that over us roll,
Though friends may forsake and may leave us forlorn,
Let this be our motto, 'twill strengthen the soul,
Though shattered our shields, and our banners be torn.

Let the proud world deride us, and think what they may,
Let the powers of darkness against us combine;
For help in temptation to God we will pray,
And move "onward and upward, and true to the line."

'Tis the watch-cry of faith, and we'll bravely go on
In the course we have marked, for the goal is divine;
And when dangers are over and victory won,
Sing "onward and upward, and true to the line."

In the "battle of life" it has borne us along;
In the "valley of death," when our spirits decline,
We'll treasure it still, and well sing the good song,
Of "onward and upward, and true to the line."

LUCY EVERTON.

BY SUSAN H. BLAISDELL.

It was nearing the sunset of a beautiful day, early in the opening summer. The orchard trees were loaded with fragrance. Their white and pink blossoms grew in thick snowy clusters, and whitened with their falling petals, as with the stainless harvest of the bygone winter, all the emerald turf below. Except where, near the foot of the old orchard, away from the trees, wound a narrow foot-path, crossing the hillside.

It was up this path, long and long ago, in the years that are far gone, that a pale, thoughtful-looking, dark-haired boy walked slowly, in the closing day. He was slight and tall for his years, which could not have been more than eighteen; but there was nothing of the awkwardness of boyhood in the graceful mould, and free though quiet motion of the slender form. Already, in that young countenance, the traits of manhood were visible. The shadowing forth of a high and earnest soul, early maturing for its future labor, was there. The soul of one already learning the lesson of life; that lesson, so sweet yet so bitter; the lesson that we must all learn, whether it is pleasant or painful; that must be learned perfectly, and only finishes at the grave. It was just opening to him.

Richard Everton was thinking of it to-night; thinking that so far it had been very pleasant and peaceful to him. That he had reason to be grateful that it was so; and was looking forward with calm faith to the future. He could not see—he only trusted. It was with a meditative brow, that leaving the shady path he was pursuing, he crossed the foot of the old orchard, and entered the field beyond, that lay broad and clear in the sunset light, with only the lengthening shadows of the distant trees, intersecting the golden bars of the evening sunshine, that grew softer and paler every moment. A soft breeze, springing up, sighed gently around him, and lightly rustled through the deep grass. It bore faintly to his ear the sound of distant voices—the approaching tramp of horses' hoofs.

Light and musical laughter rippled along the evening air; and lightly leaping the low wall separating the field from the road that bounded it, he observed a party of three persons drawing near, on horseback. The party consisted of a gentleman, handsome, dark and haughty-looking, and who bore himself gracefully and well; and two young ladies, who, though of various styles of beauty, yet bore to each other a certain resemblance which showed them to be related. For Madaline and Lucy Everton were sisters. Madaline, the elder, must have been nearly eighteen; fair in complexion, with large, deep blue eyes, and abundant golden hair; and a countenance so perfectly beautiful, so sweet and charming, that one must be fascinated by its loveliness, despite himself.

Lucy seemed some twelve or eighteen months younger, and she, too, was fair, with the same large, deep-blue eyes, the same abundant golden hair; but the expression of those eyes was different—it was graver—softer—more thoughtful; in its pensive softness, her countenance was even more lovely than that of Madaline.

Richard Everton's color slightly rose, as he beheld this party; but his glance passed the other two, to rest on Madaline. He proceeded more slowly; they, drawing nearer, recognized him, and Madaline, reining up her horse, held out her hand to him, with a lovely smile, saying in her gentlest voice, "Good evening, cousin!"

A happy look beamed in his fine, hazel eyes, as he received with a timid pressure the beautiful hand so freely given him; and the soft color, that rose for a moment fluttering to her cheek, filled him with an emotion inexpressible.

Lucy sat silent till he turned to her. There was no flush of feeling in her cheek, as he bent over her hand; as she, too, bade him good evening. But her soft eyes grew gentler still; and their serious smile of welcome dawned with a tender beauty, and died lingeringly away again, unseen beneath the drooping lashes.

The gentleman merely bowed, with a half-haughty inclination, to Richard, and remained silent. Madaline, only, exchanged a few words with the young man, before riding on.

"Your father, I trust, is well this evening?" he said.

"He is unusually well, I thank you, Richard," she answered; then added in a low tone, as musical and winning as it was sad: "O, how I wish, cousin, you would come up sometime and see him! I am sure—I am very sure, he would welcome you. Indeed, I think—I am afraid—you judge him wrongly. I know he could not but learn to—to like you."

Her white little hand, as she murmured these words, was laid entreatingly upon his, that rested upon her horse's neck. The blood wavered in the young man's brow, with the emotion pervading his breast, at the seemingly unconscious tenderness of that voice and touch. How sweet they both were to him! But he shook his head.

"Nay, Madaline, I fear it is impossible for me to win your father's affection. Nay—do not look so sad, dear cousin! One day, perhaps, he and I may know each other better than we ever have yet. I must wait patiently till then. But," glancing towards Madaline's companion, "I fear I detain you, cousin. Let me say good-by."

"Good-by then, Richard."

She allowed her hand to rest in his an instant, even softly returned its pressure; and then, with another of her rare, sweet smiles, turned away. Lucy saw his eyes lingering on her sister's face, with unutterable tenderness of expression. When he turned to her, there was an unconscious cloud of trouble on her sweet face. It was with an accent of sadness in her kind voice, that she bade him adieu, and then, with downcast eyes, rode on.

"That was our young divine, I believe—was it not, Miss Everton?" asked Madaline's cavalier, as the party proceeded. "For really, I am not certain, although I think I have had the honor of being introduced to him." He spoke in a light tone, and a faint glow dawned in Lucy's fair cheek.

"That, Mr. Cameron," she answered, quietly, without waiting for Madaline to speak, "was our cousin, Richard Everton."

The gentleman slightly bit his lip, and colored at the rebuke. Madaline, too, seemed somewhat confused, but covered Lucy's grave answer with some gay rejoinder; and so they rode on; but Lucy spoke no more on the way homeward.

She knew that her cousin Richard loved Madaline; it needed nothing more than her own woman's heart to tell her that. And she knew that Madaline, pleased with the knowledge of her power over his affections, delighted to feed her own vanity by encouraging them—by coquetting with and deceiving him. For it amounted only to that—all the notice Madaline Everton bestowed on her cousin Richard. He was only a poor student—he was only to be a country clergyman. It was presumption in him to look upon her with the regard that every glance and tone of his betrayed. But his boyish love flattered her, nevertheless; and so, herself half bewildered by her gratified vanity, she led him on, knowing all the time that it was only to make him miserable at last.

She did not call it wicked, or cruel, or even wrong, thus to encourage him. If there were ever times when her conscience told her that it was so, she turned away from the accusing voice, and hushed it, saying to herself: "I know he never can hope to marry me. He must know it himself. For my father looks coldly on him. He does not like him, and never would permit me to marry him. Richard must know this, but he cannot help caring for me still; and would it not be more cruel in me than, to treat him with indifference? to deny him even the brief happiness I can give him, by allowing him to believe his affections returned?"

With such sophistry as this she glossed over her own selfishness. It was true that Sir James Everton did not look with favor upon his young nephew. For Richard Everton's father had won for his bride the first love of his elder brother; and the baronet, embittered against him on that account, had treated him and his family thenceforth as strangers. Richard's father and mother were dead; but the hard feelings Sir James had entertained towards them, were extended even to their child, after their death. He seldom saw Richard, and only favored him with a brief and constrained sign of recognition, when he did so. But this was no excuse for Madaline's indulgence in the spirit of coquetry natural to her. Lucy felt it. But she had never, by word or sign, touched upon the subject of her sister's conduct, in any of their conversations. She avoided—she shrank from it. Only, when she beheld Madaline thus coquetting with him, a deep pain was in her heart, and she said to herself: "O, if Madaline only knew what such love as Richard's is worth!"

"Lucy?"

"Well, father?"

"Where is your sister Madaline this evening? I have not seen her for the last hour."

"She is walking with Mr. Cameron in the grounds, I think, sir. She went out with him a little while since."

Lucy had suspended her sewing, for a moment, as she answered her father's questions, and regarded him questioningly; for there was an unusual cloud on his brow this evening. He paced the room slowly to and fro, with folded arms, his eyes downcast with an expression of serious—almost stern thought.

"Lucy," he said, again, presently, "Madaline sees her cousin Richard, occasionally, I believe?"

"Yes, father," Lucy answered, in a subdued voice. The question agitated less than surprised her; for it was the first time, almost, that she had ever heard her father speak Richard Everton's name.

"They must have met frequently, I think?" was her father's next question.

"Yes, father." And her voice slightly trembled. "Madaline rides out a great deal, and the road, you know, winds directly past his house. And we have seen him very often at Dr. West's."

He was silent a moment. Then he said, briefly: "So I had concluded. I happened to see them in conversation, this morning, and observed them both. They did not see me. Lucy," and he paused before her, with a sudden decision of manner, "Lucy, tell me truly, do you know anything of the sentiments with which they regard each other?"

She hesitated and trembled.

"I think that—Richard—likes Madaline, father," she said, at last.

"Ay, likes."

It was all he said—those two words. But they were uttered with a stern significance, that showed how well he comprehended the thought which she failed to express freely.

"Well, Lucy—and she—Madaline—the type of her sex? She 'likes' him also?"

The young girl was silent.

"Lucy—tell me," and he spoke with grave command, "you must know something of this: do you not think your sister is deceiving him—Richard Everton, my nephew? Do you not see that she is coquetting with him—amusing herself at his expense—making a temporary plaything of the boyish heart that he has placed in her merciless keeping?"

"Yes, father."

She could but just whisper the words. She bent over her work to hide the slow, large tears that filled and blinded her blue eyes.

"I thought so. You may wonder I see so far, Lucy, but I have not been quite oblivious of all that has been going on around me. No! Good cause have I to watch in accents like these, where my own child is concerned! She would deceive him—I see it!—as one equally beautiful once deceived me."

He paused abruptly. The table on which his hand rested, shook beneath its pressure. He was strongly agitated; a single moment, and he rallied.

"I have never been kind to Richard, Lucy," he said. "I regret it now. Next to you and your sister, he is my nearest of kin. He is not to blame for the deeds of his parent. But even were he my enemy, I wou'd not see him made miserable as I have been, and by a child of mine. I am going to examine this matter, Lucy."

He stood there in stern and silent meditation a moment longer; and then, without speaking a word, went out. Before the sun had sunk in the horizon, he came back, but not alone; one was with him, in whom it was easy to recognise the boy-student we met something more than three years ago. In these three years, Richard had finished his theological studies, and already he was ordained for the ministry. And still, through all his labors, he never ceased to love Madaline Everton. Mr. Cameron had been absent from England all this time, and had but just returned. That night, Sir James Everton went to repair the error of years. No little astonishment it created to see him come back to Everton Hall, accompanied by his long-estranged nephew. His uncle had sought him out, and asked his forgiveness for the neglect of past years. He had asked frankly and as frankly received an assurance of the good-will of his nephew. It was as a token of their reconciliation, that Richard entered to-night, his uncle's house, by his uncle's side. He could scarcely credit the words his uncle uttered. For Sir James Everton had made Richard confess his love for Madaline; and while the young man had sat silent, awaiting a harsh reprimand for his presumption, his uncle, with a voice strangely unsteady, had said:

"Then, Richard, if you love her, and believe your love returned, go and seek Madaline out. Learn what her feelings truly are. If she reciprocates your attachment you shall have her."

"Sir," uttered Richard, tremblingly, "sir, you will then permit her to wed a poor man like myself?"

"Richard," answered his uncle, excitedly, "if you had not a penny I would give her to you with freedom. For she has led you to believe that she is not indifferent to you."

"Yee—she has—she has!" uttered Richard, with impetuous earnestness.

"Yet, Richard," and the old man was pale with emotion, "let me warn—though it is with the deepest pain that I utter it—I would have you prepare yourself for disappointment. She may have been deceiving you."

"Deceiving me!" Richard's countenance grew colorless as marble. "No, no, anything but that!"

"Come and see, then, Richard. Satisfy yourself. Learn her sentiments towards you from her own lips. Then, if she loves, and is thus worthy of you, my blessing shall be upon your union. But if not, then—"

He did not finish, and they went forth in silence. But on their way, he said, in a voice of emotion, "Richard, I dread the coming hour, for it may be like one that has brought to me the greatest suffering my life ever knew. Too strongly does Madaline remind me of one who once played me false. It would be a bitter thing, to feel that a child of mine should cause another the unhappiness she brought to me."

Looking from her own little casement, Lucy Everton had seen him coming towards the hall, and with mingled happiness and sorrow, went down to welcome her cousin to her father's house. She knew what he had come for, and how hopeless was his errand.

It was with complete astonishment that Madaline beheld Richard, and learned that henceforth her father welcomed him for all time, to his heart and his home. Greater, still her agitation and confusion, when, sanctioned by her father's approval, Richard asked her, trembling between hope and fear, to be his wife.

But the trial had come, and must be passed. So, while he waited, with a brow pale with suspense, to learn his fate, she answered, calmly:

"I am very sorry, Richard, if you have misunderstood me. I am betrothed to another. Mr. Cameron is to-night to seek my father's consent to our union."

"Madaline, Madaline," he uttered, "can this indeed be so? O, if looks and tones are not to be trusted, how wofully have I deceived myself!"

"You are right, Richard," she answered, haughtily. "You have deceived yourself. I do not know what right you have to believe that I could ever marry a poor country clergyman."

Feeling that she was guilty of meanness towards her cousin, her anger rose, and displayed itself against him for forcing the consciousness upon her. In a hasty moment her incensed feelings found vent in this unworthy language.

For one moment the blood rushed painfully to his brow, then receded. He rose.

"Madaline," he said, "I have been presumptuous. I should have known better than to offer you my poor fortunes. But it was more—it was a true heart's love that I brought you. It has returned to me now. Forget, Madaline, as I shall do, that it ever existed."

"O, Madaline, Madaline! how could you be so cruel to Richard?"

The cheek of Madaline flushed angrily, as Lucy's sorrowful voice uttered its gentle rebuke.

"Cruel, Lucy? I do not understand you. I do not see any cruelty in refusing a man whom I do not care for in the slightest degree."

"But you made him believe you liked him—you know it, Madaline. You know how he hung on every look and word of yours. You knew it, Madaline, and it was cruel to lead him on to the very last and then cast aside the heart he offered you."

"It was his own fault. He should not have presumed as he did. And now let us leave this subject. It is one I do not choose to discuss further."

So Madaline Everton married Mr. Cameron, and left Everton Hall for a new home. But it was with many a pang of conscience that she prepared for all this. Her father never smiled on her after her heartless rejection of Richard. His demeanor, cold, constrained and severe, punished her for her unworthy conduct, in its change from his former free and affectionate manner. But so it continued to the last moment of her departure; and she went away with her husband, knowing that she had lost her father's respect, and feeling and seeing that Richard, seeing her in her true light, that of a heartless coquette, had completely thrown off the thralldom in which her charms had held him. She felt that he, in his noble, lofty manhood, looked with compassion on the littleness of her nature; not despising her, because he was too gentle—too truly good to despise a living creature—but pitying her sincerely, and loving her no longer. For he saw her now as she was.

Lucy and her father lived alone at Everton, now, and the place was very quiet. Madaline's departure from it had necessarily made it so; while the memory of her falsity and unworthiness combined to cast a shadow over the hearts of those she had left.

"Richard," said Sir James one day, "we are lonely at Everton. I am growing an old man now. Will you come and dwell there with me? You have no ties to keep you away."

The gentle friendliness always marking Sir James's manner towards his nephew since their reconciliation, had won Richard's heart. He had grown to respect first, then to love his uncle. No sad remembrance of Madaline intruded now to render painful to him the thought of dwelling in the house so thronged with associations connected with her. He knew that his uncle needed his society. He experienced some pleasure in being so near him and Lucy; and he went away from his own quiet home to theirs. They were all happier for his coming. The old mansion seemed to grow pleasanter than it ever had been, after he came. The long, bright summer days grew brighter, though they fled more swiftly in the sunshine of Richard's presence.

They were beautiful Sabbaths, too, when leaning on her father's arm, with Richard on the other side, Lucy walked to the little village church; and then, within its gray old walls, they listened to his voice from the sacred desk, and gathered his gentle teachings up in their hearts.

They were pleasant Sabbaths to Sir James. He learned the full worth of Richard, both from his precepts and his daily life. He saw him beloved and revered by his parishioners, and he himself grew to honor no less than love him.

And who shall say how gentle Lucy Everton revered her noble cousin? Ever near him, she saw more fully and clearly, day by day, the value of that which her sister had so wilfully cast aside. She looked up to Richard with quiet, earnest, silent affection—a blending of love, respect and reverence, such as her gentle and thoughtful nature must feel for that which was beautiful and noble and good.

"O, Madaline, Madaline!" she murmured mentally, sometimes, "why did you reject him? How happy, how enviable would have been your destiny, as the bride of Richard."

But all things were as they should have been. Far away from Everton Hall, in all the bustle and whirl of the gay metropolis, Madaline was leading such a life of splendor and of worldly triumph as was best suited to her nature; and Richard Everton, hearing of her brilliant existence there, realized the wisdom of that Providence by which all things are rightly ordered, and gave no sigh or regret to the hour when his path was so ruthlessly turned aside from that of his vain and beautiful cousin.

Quietly and happily a few brief years glided away; and then Sir James Everton was gathered to his fathers. He died a peaceful death, blessing Richard and his children in his last fleeting moments; conversing seriously and affectionately with Madaline, who, forgetting her vanity and her heartlessness, mourned with the keenest distress for his approaching loss, and bequeathing the weeping Lucy to Richard's care.

Richard went away after his uncle's death, on a journey; and Lucy, in her mourning solitude, dwelt alone at Everton; for she would not go to her sister's splendid home in those sorrowful days. She preferred retirement, more suited to grief. Everton was Richard's now, and all that belonged to it. The title of his uncle, with the bulk of his property, was bequeathed to him. Lucy's property consisted of one or two estates which came to her from her mother. She only remained at Everton now, till her cousin should return. Then she was going away. She told him so, on the wild November evening when they sat together in the old drawing-room by the fire, after he came back.

"Going, Lucy?" he echoed, gently; "no, no. Everton is your home."

She shook her head, sadly, without speaking. Richard regarded her tenderly for a moment, then laid his hand on hers.

"Lucy, Everton would miss you a great deal; do you not think it would?"

Still she did not speak; but the tears filled her eyes.

"Yes, Everton would miss you much; but I should miss you more," he said, in a tone of sweet and serious affection, "Lucy, I should not be at rest, if you were not here. It is very, very sweet to have you near me. Lucy, you will not go away from home—from me? I would have you stay, dear one, as the mistress of Everton still; as Richard Everton's wife. Will you wed him, my beloved cousin?"

It was a moment for Lucy Everton too sweet to be real. "Richard's wife." But it was true; and now the tears were happy ones that fell from Lucy's eyes, as Richard drew her to his breast.

HOW TO SEE A BROTHER.

The following anecdote is told of Prince Oscar of Sweden: When a boy, he was one day roaming over his father's palace in quest of his brother, who was lately appointed Viceroy of Norway. Not finding him, he asked a chamberlain he happened to meet, where he was.

"His royal highness," answered the officer, "is now under arrest?"

"For what?"

"For having in a passion broken the mate to the porcelain vase you see on the mantel-piece."

"Well, I would like to see him."

"Impossible," was the answer; "his majesty, your father, has given me orders to the contrary."

Whereupon young Oscar, walking up to the mantel-piece, snatched the costly Sevres, saying as he did so:

"Now, sir, you will please have me arrested, and mind you see to it that they put me in the same room with my brother.—Albion."

A modern writer says: "I never give a man credit for having the power of doing what he never does. Plausibility is very imposing, no doubt; but when I see one of whom people say, 'He has talent, he has genius, if he would use them right; I think it is a sham, and not the real thing; for sound talent and true genius don't go with a laggard spirit—they are like a spur in the heel to keep a man advancing.'"

SONG.

BY J. P. STONE.

Dear Nell was bright and fair to see,
As a balmy orient day;
And we vowed to each other a constancy
That never should dwindle away.
But I sighed and smiled; when she swore by the gods,
That her love was forever and aye.
Sing heigho! Now loud the mountain rill!
And heigho! The deeper stream, how still!

Her eye was of night—her cheek of warm day,
And her lips were an endless feast.
Her step cheered the shore where we walked, as the morn
Cheers hilltop and lee in the east.
And we leaned o'er the lake, and could see but ourselves
And heaven just beyond,—and were blest.
Sing heigho! How loud the mountain rill!
And heigho! The deeper stream, how still!

To trust a woman and be deceived
Is more foolish than children's play!
Nell had sworn by the gods to her love; I believed,
And went dreamy and glad on my way.
My vows of love are each moment fulfilled,
And hers—I will not say!
But heigho! How loud the mountain rill!
And heigho! The deeper stream how still!

THE WRECKER BOY:

—OR,—

THE FIGHT ON THE BEACH.

BY WILLIAM O. BATON.

By the sea-side, on a high cliff which formed part of a long reach of rocky coast, stood Marrice—a lad of some fourteen or fifteen years. He was a stout, handsome youth, with more thought and manliness in his bearing than is common to that age. His dark eyes scanned the waste of rolling waters with a calm, steady, melancholy gaze, as leaning upon an oar, a net which he had been repairing, at his feet, he awaited the approach of a boat which was rounding a headland some three miles distant. He was attired in a fisherman's garb, and as the ribbon from his tarpaulin hat and the red scarf about his half-exposed throat fluttered in the breeze, he stood a picture of humble and unconscious grace, such as an artist's eye would have delighted to dwell upon.

Behind him, at the distance of about a quarter of a mile, stood a number of rude fishermen's huts some hundred rods apart, and before the doors of some of them the fishers, or rather wreckers—for such they were—were busily engaged in repairing their fishing tackle and otherwise providing for the equipment of their boats.

"Ronald is coming," said one of them, "for see! Maurice is making the sign to us. Rely upon it, he sees a storm in the wind's eye as well as we do. Heaven send us a good wreck this time! The last was all work and worry, and little profit."

"The devil send you a wreck, you mean!" at this moment interposed a rude, weather-beaten, hard-visaged woman, who was standing in the door-way of one of the cottages, and had been watching Maurice with interest long before he made the sign. "You don't flatter yourself that Heaven has anything to do with your murdering and robbing the poor, helpless castaways, whom the less cruel sea surrenders to your clutches, do you?"

"How now, old woman!" returned the wreck-er who had spoken; "what has stirred you up this morning? You must have got out of the wrong side of the bed—eh? How should we live except by knocking the brains out of those who were half-dead already, as they were washed ashore? Our lives are as good as theirs, and we're not going to starve. If they don't want to be killed, they mustn't come ashore, and cheat the sea of its due. Let 'em drown! What we get, we'll have."

"You'll have a rope round your neck one of these days, and I shall live to see it," retorted the woman. "I only hope poor Maurice may never learn to do as you have done."

"O, let Maurice alone," said one of the wreckers; "he'll be the very prince of wreckers yet, if you don't make a weak fool of him with your nonsense. He's nigh as strong as a man already, and there's not a better hand among us with a boat. He pulled me from the undertow, the last stormy night we had, when I thought nothing could save me. And nobody else would have risked it but him. Perhaps it may be in my way to do him a service, some day. If so, I'll do it at any sacrifice, as sure's my name's Bob Hammer."

"And as sure's my name's Joe Darby," said the one who had first spoken, "if Ronald don't do better by me than he has done the last three or four times, in sharing, I'll take what proportion I earn, come what may! I won't be fooled any longer with his captaincy and his equal divisions—not I!" And he took a huge chew of tobacco to fortify and give emphasis to his resolution.

"Ha, ha!" laughed the woman.

"Don't laugh at me!" fiercely exclaimed Darby.

"Ha, ha!" repeated she; "you will, if you can, Joe Darby—not without. Both my husband Ronald and you are brutes, sure enough; but as he is the bigger brute, he'll have his own way, I reckon." And without another word, she went into the hut—Darby still muttering to himself.

"Here comes the captain, with Maurice," said Hammer, as the twin were seen leaving the cliff's edge. "It's blowing a stiff breeze already, and those clouds tell us there'll be work to-night."

At the appearance of Ronald Marksley, seven or eight men from the various huts of the group were seen hastening towards his house, where, on their arrival, a conference was had regarding his disposal of the common stock of plunder, the tidings from the neighboring town, preparations for the storm, torches, etc.; etc.; and after an hour's talk, they separated—the breeze, meanwhile, having increased into a strong gale and the rain pouring in torrents.

"Why do you act so mysteriously, mother?" asked Maurice of Dame Marksley later in the day, as she beckoned him, with significant looks, from the apartment where her husband lay asleep, stretched upon the floor. "What is it you would say to me?"

"Maurice, my boy, long I have wished to disclose to you an important secret, but fear of him, and the thought that it might do no good, prevented me. But he treats me like a slave, and I so wish that you may not follow in the bloody track of these dreadful men, that I will reveal it to you—and may God turn your knowledge to good account! Maurice, you are not our son!"

"Is it possible?" exclaimed he, starting and turning white. "What! are you not my mother?"

"Hush! Ronald may feign sleep and overhear," replied she, with her finger on her lips. "You are the sole survivor of a ship which was wrecked on yonder shore when you were about four years old. You, too, would have been murdered, as was he in whose arms you were washed ashore by a mighty wave, had I not stayed Ronald's ruthless arm, after he had given the finishing touch to the unhappy man who had folded you to his breast, to save or perish with you. Yielding to my prayers, he consented to let you live, and adopt you as our son. Whether the murdered man was your father, I know not; but certain it is you are not our child, and I thank God that you are not! I tell you this, my lad, that you may turn with loathing from the bloody ways of these relentless monsters, who fatten upon misery, and who take a mortal's life with as little compunction as they would hook a fish. Keep this a secret, Maurice, and while you stay with us, do all you can to save, instead of taking life. Be a saviour, instead of a destroyer, and by every safe means thwart the assassins in their dark hours of cowardly pillage. So God will prosper you, and his vengeance, which will surely light upon them, will be averted from your head."

"I will save all I can, hereafter," replied the wrecker boy, gravely. "I never liked their ways nor deeds, and have never yet harmed a castaway. But O, this news makes me feel so strangely! I don't know whether to feel glad about it or not. You don't think," he added, earnestly, pressing her arm, "that it was my father that he—murdered, do you?"

"Perhaps not, boy—perhaps not. I remember his face; I don't think he looked like you."

"O, I hope it wasn't. But then, even if he were not my father, perhaps my father was on board, and then—then"—and he burst into tears and sobs—"he must have died, at any rate!"

"Here, Maurice! Run over to Bob Hammer's and ask him if my knife is ready. He was to put a new handle on, and sharpen it. Be spry."

These words proceeded from Marksley in the next room, he having just awoke. The forlorn wrecker boy brushed away his tears hastily, and went upon the errand—his heart heavier than it had ever been before. He now felt alone in the world—and amid such associations!

As night came on, the sky became charged with furious clouds, and there was a mighty moan, which swept across the black ocean, seeming like the voice of some monster of the waters yearning for his human prey. The vaulting billows appeared to leap, in fiendish gladness to the clouds, which were preparing food for them, and their white crests smiled in anticipation; while their steady, rolling, irresistible gush, as they swayed along together, sounded like whispers of the fury which was to come. Awful was the voluminous gloom of the waste of dark and billowy hills! awful the Cimmerian canopy which made earth and ocean cower, beneath its frown and portentous sigh. O, who are on the deep to-day? Will they reach their port or their doom to-night, or straggle triumphant through an open sea? How many thousand prayers are offered for them! Will they be answered by Him who poured the flood, or shall they be as fruitless as the sea-bird's cry?

The league of wreckers—some eight or ten, sworn solemnly to stand by each other in secrecy to the death—were prepared to answer such a question in their own way. For many miles, the coast, of which they were the haunting demons, presented no point upon which, should a vessel be driven there, there was the most remote chance of escape from shipwreck. Many were the stout ships which had dashed to pieces on that dread shore, the terror of the mariner, the delight of the ravenous fish and ocean-fowl, and of the wreckers more savage than they.

"O, this is a glorious blaster, men!" exclaimed the remorseless Marksley, as they assembled on the cliff just as day went down, with sad face, behind the veil of heaven, as if hiding in grief for the wretchedness which was impending. "And see! four—five—seven ships in the offing! We shall be the most luckless dogs alive, if some of them are not ours."

Repairing to a boat-house on the beach, the party, of whom Maurice and Mrs. Marksley were members, with provisions for a rude lunch, and with bludgeons, knives, etc., awaited the expected sounds of distress—signal guns or lights booming or glaring over that mighty graveyard! Nor had they long to wait. A gun was heard—the sound muffled by the roaring waves—and the men sprang to their feet and went forth upon the rocky shore to watch. Other guns, nearer and nearer, were fired in rapid succession, and a light was seen not more than a mile from the frowning shore.

"Poor wretches! God have mercy on them!" ejaculated Mrs. Marksley, who had remained in the boat-house with Maurice. Tears started into the wrecker boy's eyes, for he thought of all she had told him that day, and had brooded, ever since, over the probable fate of his father. The old woman continued: "Wind and wave are driving them directly on these accursed rocks! There's not the slightest hope for them. Merciful hands might save a few, but they would as well fall into the tiger's clutches as among these. Better that they should drown at once!"

The wreckers had kindled a bonfire—sad misnomer!—on the shore, as if in sign that friendly aid might be expected; and the helpless vessel, a ship of large size, all management of her having finally been abandoned as useless, drove, headlong, upon the rocks—horrible cries of despair mingling with the noises of the storm, as she went to pieces in the dark.

"Maurice, you may have a chance to-night to do God and man service," said Dame Marksley, hurriedly, as they prepared to go forth. "If you do, lose it not. Thwart these demons, if you can. Remember your own wrongs, and should you see a struggle going on, give aid to the unfortunates, not to our men—not even to Ronald, should he be in peril of his life. I will be at your side to direct you."

"I will do as you say," said Maurice, firmly, "as surely as I hope to see my father in heaven, where, you have taught me, I can never reach, should I shed blood of any human creature. O, my poor father!"

They stepped forth from the boat-house into the wild scene of darkness, danger and death. The crash of broken timbers mingled with the roar of the elements and the cries for help. The surging waters answered with relentless dashing, and engulfed many a hapless wretch forever.

"They are about it! Look, Maurice! They are dashing the brains out of those men yonder. And see! Ronald is struggling beyond, with one of those who are washed ashore. If we have not strength, let us use craft. If he prevails, let us try what art will do to save the man. Come!"

The two hastened to the place where, stumbling and struggling among the rocks, sometimes knee deep in the breakers, Ronald and the stranger tugged for life. The latter proved a match for his antagonist, despite the exhaustion resulting from the shipwreck.

"Here, Maurice, Helen, help!" cried the wrecker chief, as his strength began to fail him.

Maurice ran to the stranger, and fastening about his neck, exclaimed in his ear:

"Fall, friend! fall, and I will save you. Fall!"

Whether the man believed, or whether his feet slipped at that moment on the seaweed which mantled the rocks beneath his feet, the desire of Maurice was gratified—he did fall; and Maurice, as if by accident, stumbled between the legs of Marksley with such force, as to pitch him headlong upon the sharp rocks, where a wave rolled over him, bruised and bleeding by the fall.

"Blundering fool! Is this the way you aid me?" were the first words which escaped the lips of the earaged and baffled wrecker, as, pretending to be anxious for his safety, Maurice hauled him roughly away from his adversary up the beach. "Where is he?" he added, looking round in the darkness for his opponent in vain.

"I saw a heavy wave roll back with him into the sea," said Dame Marksley. "It's all over with him by this time."

"Are you there, Helen?" exclaimed Marksley, feeling for her. "I would you had been here in time to have hit him with a bludgeon. But we shall find his body, I suppose. Where's Maurice?"

Maurice had suddenly disappeared. Through all the excitement of the scene, he had not lost sight of the stranger, and had now gone to his relief. The man was scrambling, exhausted, up the rocky acclivity slowly on hands and knees, when, just as Maurice put forth his hand to assist him, a broad and awful mountain wave thundered up over them both. Quick as thought, the hardy wrecker boy sprang forward and fell, clinching with an iron gripe the rocks on which he lay prostrate. The retiring wave left him there; but not so fortunate was the stranger. He had been borne back into the trough of the sea. Maurice sprang up, and at this juncture Bob Hammer came along, with a coil of rope which he had found, upon his shoulder.

"Is that you, Bob?"

"Ay, ay, my hearty—how goes it?"

"Bob, I saved your life once," said Maurice, hurriedly. "Now return the favor. You see that man. I'll hold the rope. Fasten it round you and plunge! Quick, or it will be too late."

"I'll do it, my lad, if it costs me my life." And in less time than it takes to relate it, the grateful wrecker bounded forward into the yawning, death-fraght element, white with hissing foam.

"Hold hard, boy, and I'll have him," gurgled Bob Hammer; and rising on the top of a billow, he disappeared behind it.

The huge hill of water rolled forward and fell, bathing the legs of Maurice, to whose aid was lent the strength of some mighty stones, behind which he had taken foothold. And now, by the dim light of the distant torches on the shore, Maurice saw two dark objects floating in the trough of the sea.

He heard a faint, bubbling cry—that of a "strong swimmer in his agony"—and knew that it was the signal for him to hail; and with all his might he did so, but the burden, and the force and weight of the waters would have proved too much for him had he not fortunately been aided at this crisis by the timely arrival of Dame Marksley.

"Pull! pull! or they'll drown—pull!" cried Maurice, panting with fatigue and excitement; and the wrecker's wife bent to the task, and her sinewy arms were exerted to good purpose. A rising wave assisted their last efforts, and brought the rescued twain high up the rocks, several feet beyond them.

"Whew!" sputtered the woman, as drenched by the billow, and with her mouth full of gravel and salt water, she scrambled up from the awkward position into which she had been thrown, "that was the biggest wave of to-night."

"Bob," cried Maurice, running to him, "how do you feel?"

"Well enough, only a little out of breath."

"Will you do me another favor?"

"Yes, a hundred!"

"Then help carry this man to a place of safety—any nook high up in the rocks will do. And keep this a secret; this man must not die.”

“Not if he ben’t dead already, you mean.”

The man lay motionless where the wave had left him.

“We’ll see how that is; but let us be quick, or we may be seen by the captain!” And they lifted the insensible man along to a more secure place, while Mrs. Marksley repaired to where the other wreckers were busy securing their plunder, as the waves gave it to them; ever and anon giving a fatal rap on the head of some half-drowned creature, that the morning might bring them no disputants for their prize.

When Maurice disappeared, Marksley, taking it for granted that his late adversary was drowned, had hurried towards that part of the beach where the most of his men were engaged, and on the way he ran against Joe Darby, whom he found busy rifling the pockets of a corpse which had been flung ashore.

“Ha! are you there, Darby? A prize, eh?”

“Ay, and a rich one, too; and mine, mark you, mine, all mine. No sharers in this, you may be sure of that.” And Darby held up a gold watch and chain, and a large and apparently well-stuffed leather pocket-book, dripping with brine. “Who knows but there’s a fortune there.”

“If there is, or whatever there is, it will be shared equally among us,” insisted Marksley.

“Will it, though?” sneered Darby, about to stow it away.

“Ay, will it!” quickly returned Marksley, enraged at this dishonest braving of a compact which all had sworn to observe; “and this—” and he adroitly snatched it as he spoke,—“this to make sure of it!”

In the next instant they were engaged in a deadly embrace. Mutual hatred so absorbed them, that while they grappled they would have been engulfed by the breakers had they not suddenly been parted by three or four of their comrades, who came up, crying, “Boat! boat! Wreckers ahoy!”

A boat, bottom upwards, to whose keel clung half a dozen men, was on the point of being hurled ashore, and the wreckers were desirous of mustering all their strength at that point that not one should escape to tell the tale of that awful night.

“Fighting among ourselves! For shame! Let’s look to the boat first!” exclaimed the remorseless villains, ravenous as sharks for their victims. “Let us attend to their welfare, and then, when they’re sent home, fight after, if we please. Hurry!”

The combatants desisted, and all sped to the spot whereon the boat was now cast, like a toy, by the mighty sea. It had evidently come from some vessel which had foundered, since otherwise no boat would have ventured to try that wrathful waste of billows, and miraculous indeed was their preservation thus far.

The wreckers, with murderous intent, had grouped together to make short work of those whom the hand of God had protected; and just as the boat dashed with a thundering shock upon the dark beach, Dame Marksley arrived, and seeing how matters stood, hastily collected such sticks as she could find, which might be used as weapons, designing them for the use of the shipwrecked strangers, should they be so fortunate as to be able to wield them.

“Now, men,” shouted Marksley, “death to all!” And they brandished their clubs, as the hapless men were jolted, sprawling, among the surf-boiling rocks.

“Death to you, first!” at this instant shouted Joe Darby. And he plunged a dirk deep in the side of his unsuspecting leader, who turned upon him, the blade still sticking between his ribs. Thus two of the wreckers were prevented from at once pouncing upon their intended prey, and the odds in number were now made about equal. The renewed strife between Marksley and Darby so disconcerted the others of the gang as greatly to paralyze their efforts, and ere a blow was struck, four of the strangers were on their feet, and were armed and warned by the resolute Dame Marksley; and at this juncture, Maurice providentially appeared with Bob Hammer, and together they dragged the remaining two from the surf, just as they were being swept back into the roaring, tumultuous waters.

Blindly obedient to the wrecker boy, in fulfilment of his gratitude, Bob Hammer sided with the strangers, Maurice and he each lending them a knife; and when the onset came, the wreckers met with a stout and most unexpected opposition. Their leader, still contending with his implacable foe, Joe Darby, rolled with him beneath their slippery feet, scarce minded by them in their new apprehensions for their own lives.

“Take that, traitor!” said one of them, dealing a deadly blow at Bob Hammer, as he was found arrayed against them.

“Thank you, I’d rather not!” cried Bob, expertly dodging the unfriendly manifestation; and the force of the blow, spent upon air, precipitated the giver headlong among rocks and seaweed.

“Take this, with my compliments, Pete Wyvil!—and it’s the last you’ll ever want, I hope,” said Bob, bringing down a crushing blow which fractured the fellow’s skull.

The conflict was now general, and as fierce as may be imagined among men striving for dear life. Though much exhausted by their struggles with the waves, the men who had just escaped shipwreck—the value of life and the hope of it having now grown stronger and dearer than ever,—became inspired with a new energy, which made them equal to the fearful occasion. And they were doubly encouraged at finding friends in the midst of their dastardly enemies.

The wrecker boy moved in the thickest of the conflict—which was waged by the solitary glare of a torch, stuck in the rocks a few rods higher up the shore,—like a sprite, dashing in where he could render assistance to the strangers, and ever and anon dealing a serviceable stroke upon the arm or head of some wrecker at the very moment when he imagined his victory secure. Deep and ferocious were the curses heaped upon him, upon the “old woman,” and on Bob Hammer, by the baffled, panting, bruised and bleeding wreckers, as they found themselves forced finally to yield, step by step, and to fly before their desperate opponents, leaving three of their number dead and horribly mutilated upon the resounding beach.

“Victory!” shouted Bob Hammer, as the last of his late comrades fled up the cliff, or along the shore. “Victory! Maurice, my lad, I never felt the joy of doing a good action as I do now.”

“You did nobly, Bob, and I hope this will be our last occasion to do anything like it throughout our lives. But see, friends!” added the wrecker boy, as the strangers gathered round their preservers, tendering them their thanks in half exhausted accents, “who are those coming this way, with lights?”

“More enemies?” exclaimed some, grasping their weapons with what remaining strength they had.

“No, no—you are mistaken,” said the wrecker boy; “they are people from the town. You will find no more fiends to deal with.”

He was right. In a few moments a crowd of men arrived, and learning the story of the affray—having been attracted to the beach by the signal guns that had been fired long before—they attended the exhausted participants in that terrible struggle up the cliffs to the habitations of the wreckers, all of which were now deserted, save by their wives and children. Among these was not forgotten him with whom Marksley had first striven that night, and who had only been left by his preservers after they had restored him to consciousness.

When morning broke, the golden sun shed not more light upon the brightening sea than did the news which enraptured the soul of the wrecker boy. In the stranger he had first been the means of rescuing, he found—his father! learning from his lips the strange tidings that he, with a few others, had alone escaped the wreck which thirteen years before had sent, as he had thought, all other of his fellow-voyagers to eternity, including his brother and his infant son. That brother had died by the hand of Marksley!

Explanations on both sides were now followed by a vigorous pursuit of the old offenders, who had been for years “unwhipt of justice,” the terror of the coast, no evidence before having been positive against them. Some escaped, and the remainder, though murder could not be proved upon them, were condemned to expiate their crimes in prison. Against Bob Hammer no proceeding was made—the story of his services on that thrilling night making him the object of general sympathy and applause. But where was Marksley and his brother murderer and plunderer, Joe Darby?

* * * * *

On the ensuing morn, when beneath the smile of the refreshing sun the subsiding ocean danced in silver, and search was made for the victims of the storm and of the fight, a dark mass was seen floating not far from the shore, rolling slowly toward it. The anxious searchers waited till it came within reach, and then pulled it from the reluctant surf. It was found to be the dead bodies of Marksley and Darby, fast locked in each other's arms. The waters had evidently been their winding sheet, as they had fallen in the death grapple. They and the other wreckers who had been slain, were buried on the shore they had so long contaminated.

Far away from that region of unhappy memories now lives the wrecker boy, his sire grown gray with years, sunning the winter of life in the constant affection of his manly son. Oft to his grandchildren he relates the story of Maurice, with natural pride and gratitude to God; and when they look up, for corroboration, to their father's face, they wonder that ever he was a WRECKER BOY.

A VILLAGE SPIRE.—The spire of a village church, seen in the distance, gives a charm to the barrenest landscape. Channing says: “An humble spire, pointing heavenward from an obscure church, speaks of man's nature, man's dignity, man's destiny, more eloquently than all the columns and arches of Greece and Rome, the mausoleums of Asia, or the pyramids of Egypt.”

THE ROSES ARE FADING.

BY ROBERT B. KATON.

The roses are fading
Like darkness at morn;
The roses are fading,
Their beauties are gone.
Those ones that were brightest
Are passing away;
To cheer and delight us
Why do they not stay?

The queen among flowers,
No perfumes now shed,
Though still in our bowers,
She's withered and dead.
O why doth she leave us?
Why will she not stay?
When the parting doth grieve us,
By hastening away.

But thus it is ever,
With ones that are dear;
Death soonest doth sever
The brightest ones here.
The ones that are nearest
And twined round the heart;
Those ones that are dearest,
The soonest depart.

And so with the flowers,
Like things here below;
When we think they are ours,
No more them we know.
They leave us in mourning,
The spots of their birth;
Still they leave us a warning
How frail is all earth.

MY COUSIN ANNIE.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"I HAVE news for you, Mary," said my fair young cousin, entering my room one morning with her sweet face all smiles and dimples, and something evidently amusing her very much.

"It must be very pleasant news to judge from your bright eyes, Annie, so let me hear it at once. Good news has been very scarce at Birch Hall of late days."

"I am not certain that you will call it 'good,' but it is none the less amusing." And then she laughed outright. "Violet is very young to be married."

I was astounded at her words, and well I might be, for Violet was my cook, and all unrivalled as she was in her profession, and setting aside her many other good qualities, she was without exception the most hideously ugly black woman I ever beheld; the African features were actually caricatured in her countenance, and not even our long acquaintance with her could soften in the least the impression of her unchangeable ugliness. That she should ever marry had not seemed to me within the bounds of possibility, and I felt inclined to doubt the truth of my merry cousin's communication.

"I can see in your eyes that you don't believe me, Mary, but it certainly is true; and the happy lover has just returned from California. He is cook on board some vessel, she says."

"You seem to be much interested in the match," said I, a little crossly.

I did feel annoyed at losing the best cook I had ever had, and could not help feeling vexed with Annie for appearing so delighted at what gave me uneasiness. It also struck me as something strange, that the beautiful, wealthy, accomplished Annie Weston should give even a passing thought to anything so far removed from her usual sphere of observation, as the marriage of my cook. In fact, I was quite puzzled to account for it, and told her so.

"We, dear Mary, we are such strangers to each other yet that it is no wonder you are unacquainted with my 'loves and aversions;' but know, O most doubting of cousins, that weddings are my chiefest delight in this world, my strongest passion; that, in fact, I have a marriage mania. A wedding! My dear girl, what visions of cake and compliments, wine and white satin, kisses and kid gloves, bouquets and bridesmaids, the word calls up; what recollections of fun and flirtations, mirth and music, of pretty faces, merry laughter, and happy hours. And yet, will you believe it," and here her face lost its joyous expression and became very sorrowful, "some of the most painful recollections of my life are connected with weddings."

"I can scarcely remember when I first acquired this taste for weddings, but have a vague idea that it was from seeing my Sabbath school teacher united to our young minister, on which occasion we children, some fifty or sixty in number, were all invited to take tea in the great dining room of the bride's father's house, and where we all assembled, trying to look very stiff and womanly in our white dresses and flower wreaths, and where I tried to seem unconscious that my wreath was too large, taking sly opportunities to push it up on my head and keeping very still, until, unluckily, the 'happy pair' came in to speak to us, when in the excitement my unfortunate garland slipped down over my eyes, and from that unto my shoulders, where it remained in spite of all my efforts to put it in the proper place again. I have attended numerous weddings since then, and as I have promised to give you a sketch of my life, I think the best way will be to give you a short history of each of these affairs, as they will serve to illustrate my otherwise uninteresting story."

As I knew my cousin was an interesting "story teller," I willingly agreed to this pleasant proposition, only stipulating that she should commence at once with her history; but this she would not agree to. "O, no, not this morning; but you make haste and get dressed while I tell Moses to get the carriage out."

"Why, where are you going?" I asked, in astonishment.

"To the city; but there, don't ask questions, and do have your bonnet on when I come down." And she hurried out of the room as if something of the utmost importance filled her mind, while I, knowing what a tyrant she could be, never thought of disobeying her orders, but proceeded to dress as fast as possible.

"Come, Mary, Moses is waiting." And drawing on my gloves, I hastily followed my little torment to the door, where our sable factotum was trying to soothe the impatience of the prancing ponies.

Seated and off, I found time to admire my beautiful cousin, as she leaned back in the carriage and appeared lost in some interesting calculations, to judge from her frequent use of tablet and pencil.

It was a clear, cold, wintry day, and the frosty air gave a brighter hue to Annie's fair cheek, and slightly tossed the bright, golden curls that clustered under the becoming little bonnet. And that bonnet itself, what a charming little contrivance it was!—what a wonderful combination of blue velvet and black lace, ostrich plumes, French flowers and blonde bordering. But then everything that Annie Weston wore looked well on her, from the magnificent Cashmere that she wrapped about her so carelessly to the little glove that seemed made for her hand, or the black satin slipper that so well became her pretty foot. And now while she is so busy with her pencil, I will take the opportunity of telling the reader a little more of the history of my fair cousin than he or she already knows.

Annie Weston's father was a captain in the British army, and having lost his wife at the time of his child's birth, he ever after devoted himself to that child, and supplied as far as he could the place of the parent she had lost. His love for his daughter was boundless, and consequently he always arranged that wherever his regiment was ordered there his child should also come, and being a man of handsome property, these journeys were made very delightful to the young lady, who knew but little of the hardships and miseries that so frequently attend military life.

As Captain Weston's regiment had for many years been on foreign stations, and continually moving, Miss Annie had seen no small portion of the world, and naturally of a happy disposition and bright, intelligent mind, she had become at nineteen, a most interesting and agreeable companion. To her father, she was the sunshine and joy of his existence. With him her word was law—hence her wilful ways,—and to please her, his constant aim and attention.

It was at this time that the Eastern war broke out, and several of the regiments stationed at the "British Colonies in North America" were summoned home and despatched to India. Captain Weston was overwhelmed with anguish when the order came for their immediate embarkation (I should have said before that they were at this time at Bermuda), and knowing well the impossibility of his daughter's going with him into the interior, and the dangers that would surround her if left alone at Calcutta, in that strange land, without one friend, and liable at any moment to fall a victim to the death-dealing fevers that prove so fatal to European constitutions in India, all these considerations induced him to leave her in America under my care and protection.

For three years I had led a very quiet life in the comfortable home left me by my husband, and so contented was I with the state of my affairs that I felt some little selfish regret when my cousin's letter arrived, asking me to take charge of his young daughter. I was his only near relative, and the moving appeals that he made to my feelings were not to be denied. I wrote to him immediately, consenting to take the responsibility, and sympathizing with him in the keen suffering such a parting must bring.

I immediately made preparations for the arrival of this strange cousin, of whose existence I had hardly ever heard before, and recollecting that she was motherless, and with scarcely a female relation, save myself, in the world, I resolutely banished all regrets about my invaded solitude, and when she came, gave her as warm a welcome as my calm, reserved habits would allow. There was soon a great change in my hitherto quiet, steady-going household, and this change was brought about by the presence of my beautiful charge, who effectually banished gloom and silence from the old mansion, and in their place brought sunshine and mirth.

But I have devoted space enough to these remarks, and will let Annie tell her own stories in her own way. I was soon enlightened as to the cause of our hasty journey to the city on the morning I have mentioned, and could not forbear laughing to myself as I saw of what her purchases consisted. It was all very well to give Violet a white dress and ribbons, but the sight of an enormous pair of gloves, a quantity of delicate blonde, and a magnificent white rose, quite upset my gravity, and I volunteered some remonstrances that were very coolly disregarded. My wilful cousin paid for her purchases, had them placed in the carriage by the bowing and obsequious shopman, and in five minutes more we were on our way home.

"Wont she be a beautiful bride?" was the first remark my hopeful companion made.

"But, my dear girl, don't you think you could have given Violet something more suitable—something she could have worn afterwards?"

"There now, no lectures; you know I can't stand them. Besides, Violet is the vainest creature I ever knew, and I am determined her love of finery shall be gratified for once. Only fancy her great black head decorated with such a cap as I intend to make her, and that beautiful rose in contrast with her horrible face! Of all the weddings I ever saw, I know this will be the best." And she laughed long and loudly at the ridiculous picture her fancy had conjured up.

As it was useless to expect anything rational from Annie until the momentous preparations for "Sweet Violet's" wedding were well under way, I lent all the assistance I could; and at last had the satisfaction of seeing the little wilful beauty quietly seated at the formidable task of hemming the fair bride's snowy flounces, of which there appeared to be an indefinite number, and the first of which she so daintily held in her little fingers.

I must here just mention, as an illustration of my spoiled pet's eccentricities, that she had never in her life made herself a dress, or in fact scarcely any article of attire; that she had a great dislike to that delight of more domestic and steadier feminines, viz., a quiet afternoon's sewing; and yet she voluntarily undertook the preparation of my Violet's "bridal array," and that with an intense interest that actually puzzled me to account for.

"I know you are dying for a story this afternoon, my most patient cousin, and as all virtues ought to be rewarded, yours shall not be the exception. But, seriously, I don't feel in a very sprightly humor to-day, so if you have no objection, I will give you a little history that I alluded to the other day, when I said that one of the most painful memories of my life was connected with a marriage. Perhaps you don't know—and if you don't, I must tell you—that three years ago this winter, we were at Quebec, and papa quite unexpectedly met an old friend in the person of a Major McIntire, who had left the army and settled down on a comfortable little farm in Upper Canada, on the banks of a river between Lake Simcoe and Georgian Bay.

"It did not require much persuasion to induce papa to let me accept the old major's warm invitation to return home with him and see his children,—said children, by the way, being half a dozen full grown men and women, not one of whom acknowledged to less than six feet altitude, and of whom I must confess I stood in most abject fear for the first forty-eight hours after my arrival; but their warm-hearted kindness soon made me forget their dangerous size, and finding that they had none but the kindest intentions, I overcame the imaginary terrors that at first made me run for my life, if one of the 'boys' even looked towards me.

"I must not stop to tell you all the sleighing parties, skating parties, dancing parties, quilting parties and sewing parties I attended that winter. In fact, our lives were one constant round of excitement, and as that is an atmosphere I was born to live in, you may be sure I lost no opportunity of dipping into the cup of pleasure so freely offered to me.

"One only drawback there was to my delight, and that was the uncommon scarcity of weddings. The very height of my expectations would be crowned, if I could only see a real country wedding, and when hope had almost given way to despair, the welcome news was announced at the breakfast table one morning, that the owner of the next farm was about to take unto himself a wife, and that the affair would come off on the evening of the third day hence.

"At first it seemed too good news to be true; but when a formal invitation came, with a special reference to "Miss Weston," there was no longer room to doubt, and we were at once plunged into a sea of confused preparation, of which I have but a very indistinct recollection, save that there was an indefinite quantity of pink and blue muslin cut up, and that Mr. Allan McIntire brought home a new plaid vest of the most alarming pattern, giving me an unpleasant impression that he was partly enveloped in flames. The eventful evening arrived at last, and as the weather had been unusually mild for the last three days, it was not considered safe to cross the river on the ice as we had always done, and a longer route, that took us over a beautiful bridge, was preferred.

"On arriving at the house of the bride's father, we found quite a large party assembled, including the minister; but the hero of the evening, Walter Allison, had not made his appearance. The bride was a pretty, little, delicate thing, with dark blue eyes, that filled with tears every time she looked at her mother, and soft, shiny brown hair that needed no ornament to add to its beauty.

"I had felt so much satisfaction, and indulged in so much excitement, that the reaction that now took place occasioned me to feel quite sad, and I sat in a shady corner of the room watching the fine young bride, as she quietly moved about among her friends, with a strange foreboding at my heart that I could in no way account for. How much longer I could have borne these distressing sensations I am unable to say, but just as I was deliberating on the propriety of going across the room and joining a party, who, in low tones and with much suppressed laughter, appeared to be enjoying themselves very well, a loud, rumbling noise filled the air, causing every one to start to their feet, while a dozen voices exclaimed with one accord, 'The river! the river!—the ice! the ice!'

"The first roaring was succeeded by a louder noise, like heavy thunder, and then came a crash that shook the house to the foundation, and every one rushed to the door and out on the little field in front of the house, where they could overlook the rushing and roaring waters that now swept past, carrying enormous masses of ice, sometimes high out of the dark stream, and again tumultuously rolling over and over each other.

"The crashing and thunder-like sounds were awful in the extreme, and for some minutes not a word could be heard by any of our party. But gradually, as the waters grew clearer, the noise became less, and the first thing I heard was Allan McIntire shouting in my ear something in which the words 'Walter' and 'on the ice' were painfully distinct. I could not hope to make him hear me, but I knew by his look that he understood my mute assent, and that we shared the same fear.

"The moon, which all the evening had been hazy and dull, now shone out bright and clear, and we all saw the dark figures of a number of men moving about the opposite bank, and from the flashing of lights, and hurrying to and fro, it was evident that something was wrong. One glance at young McIntire's pale countenance and eager eyes was enough for me, and with a sickening faintness at my heart, I returned to the house.

"I cannot describe the look of utter despair that had settled on the young bride's fair face, or the helpless grief that showed itself in her attitude, as she sat with her head leaning on her mother's arm, and her hands, weak and nerveless, hanging at her sides.

"There was something singular in the general conviction that seized the wedding party, that young Allison had met with some dreadful accident, for as yet we had no proof of such misfortune, save that he had not made his appearance among us. But those who attempted to comfort their friends with this suggestion, did it with pale faces and trembling voices, and all felt that silence and patience were the only resources left us. It came at last, the expected blow, but none the less severe that we had looked for it.

"There was a sound of many horses in fierce, wild galloping—a shout, loudly answered from the groups within and without the house, and then the door was flung open, and a dozen pale, dripping figures burst in among the now terrified and screaming guests. One, only, of all the females present was calm and tearless, and that was the pale young girl, whose bright hopes the past few hours had so cruelly crushed.

"'There's a jam at the lower bridge,' said the foremost of the intruders, in low, hurried tones. 'Come, every man of you, we may yet save the body!'

"The pale girl had half crossed the floor towards the speaker, but as these words rung through the room, she fell lifeless at his feet, and was carried to her chamber, while the hurried tramping, and then the dull silence, told us that the stranger's request had not been unheeded. Wearily, wearily the long hours that night dragged past; but daylight came at last, and with it the party from their unsuccessful search.

"It was my first experience in sorrow, and months passed ere I could recover from the effects of the shock received that dreadful night. It was an awful awakening from the childish dream that I had indulged so long, of earthly happiness; but time soothed my shattered nerves, and at last I could listen calmly to the sequel of this sad story, as it was told to me by Miss McIntire, some three or four months after my return home. The young bride had long wavered between life and death, but at last the worst danger was over, and she once more moved about her home, silent and uncomplaining, but with feeble steps and bowed form, as though her great sorrow had bereft her of strength or support. The mother—Walter Allison's mother—had gone down with sorrow to the grave. It was too heavy a blow for the poor widow, whose only hope and comfort he was, and from that dreadful night she lost all interest in worldly affairs, and was only impatient to leave the scene of her sorrows.

"I thought I never should like weddings again, that my passion was completely cured; but change of scene, and the constant round of visitors and visiting, that papa liked so well, drove my sad thoughts away, and in less than a year afterwards, I had a hand in a little romance that nobody suspected anything about. But I shall not tell you any more stories to-day, for I cannot sew fast enough while I talk, and you know there is no time to be lost."

"I am only going to give you a little sketch to-day, Mary; so don't be disappointed if it does not come up to your expectations. It is a particularly interesting recollection for me, as I was a prominent actor in the affair, but to you it may seem dull. Nearly twelve months after my visit to Upper Canada, we were in H—, and I renewed an acquaintance I had formed some three years previously, with a Mrs. Captain Belson.

"As Mrs. Belson had no family, was very rich, lived in splendid lodgings, and was very fond of me, it pleased papa that I should often go to see her; but though we kept up an apparent friendship, it was all on one side, I never liked her, and it was no use for me to try to. The most extravagant, careless, fretful, repining disposition that you could imagine, would fall far short of Mrs. Belson's; and yet she was surrounded by every luxury that wealth could command, or the most capricious taste could fancy.

"To her husband she was not even civil at times, and the only earthly thing she appeared to love was an asthmatic spaniel, so fat and lazy that life seemed a burden to it. She kept a young girl purposely to wait on herself, to read to her, and to be scolded when she had nobody else to vent her ill temper on. I was much struck with the beauty of this poor victim, and on learning her history, felt a deep interest in her. She was an orphan, and one of a large family, who, on the death of their father, had been obliged to leave a comfortable home to seek a living in the city. Having been recommended to Mrs. Belson by a lady who took an interest in her, she was gladly taken and offered such wages as she did not feel herself justified in relinquishing, hard as her lot proved to be.

"There was a look of patient trouble in her large black eyes that always made me feel unhappy, and I sincerely wished that I might in some way be of service to the poor slave of my friend's caprices. I little thought, then, how soon my wish would be granted.

"In answer to a hurried note from Mrs. Belson one morning, I went directly after breakfast to see her, and found her in the last stage of ill temper, so perfectly exhausted with rage that she was all but speechless. On inquiring the cause of this display, I learned from Laurie, her French dressing-maid, that poor Bessie Mason had confessed to her mistress, the night before, that she had a lover, that he was a soldier, and worse than all that he was one of those under orders to leave, and for whom the transport was waiting in our harbor. Laurie did not attempt to describe the scene of the previous night, but shrugged her shoulders and nodded her head in a manner that was very expressive.

"'Bessie go, madam, de fit after de fit,' was her mode of describing Mrs. Belson's hysterics.

"Finding I could be of no service, I went home and spent the day in sorrowful regrets over the fate of my pretty favorite. I knew she would not be allowed to go in the vessel, nor would her lover be allowed to marry her even under a promise that she should remain behind. I puzzled my head all day about her, and when evening came, was as far from a satisfactory conclusion as ever.

"Papa was on duty, and I had no one to advise with; but I was very glad afterwards that it happened so; for after the servant had carried away my tea things, and I had composed myself for the evening with a good fire, a bright light and a pleasant book, I was startled by a sharp knock at the door, and before I could lay down my volume, my parlor door was hurriedly opened, and in came Bessie Mason.

"There was a wildness in her black eyes that almost frightened me, and as she stood for an instant and looked steadily in my face, I saw that her countenance was deathly pale, and not a vestige of color remained even in her lips. It was but an instant she stood; the next moment she was on the carpet at my feet, grasping my hands in hers, and with the tears streaming down her face.

"'Help me! help me, Miss Weston—you are the only friend I have now.'

"'Sit down calmly, Bessie, and tell me what the trouble is,' I replied, trying to steady my voice and to raise her from the floor.

"'No, no—I shall never be calm again. Do not ask me to get up until you say you will help me.'

"'I will help you, Bessie, as far as I can, but I am afraid my influence will be of no service to you. If it was our regiment, now, papa might be able to do something for you.'

"No one but you can help me, Miss Weston, for Colonel Martin positively forbade William to get married, and we were married last night.'

"O, Bessie!' I exclaimed, really frightened now; for I knew the consequences of such disobedience, 'I am afraid you have done wrong to let William disobey such orders.'

"No, no! not wrong. I could not have lived here, knowing he was going away off to the war alone. You would not say I had done wrong if you ever loved any one as I love him.'

"Well, I am very glad I never did love anybody, Bessie; but that does not prevent my pitying you, and I will do anything at all for you if you will only tell what it is you want.'

"I want to go with him, Miss Weston, and I must go; but I cannot carry out my plans unless some one will assist me a little; and since my sisters have found out that I was keeping company with a soldier, they wont speak to me, nor let me come to the house; and so, in my trouble, I thought of you, Miss Weston—for you always seem as if you liked me, and that's why I took the liberty of coming here to-night.'

"Well, that's all right enough, Bessie, and I am glad you thought of me; but even now, I don't see how I can help you. What are your plans?'

"I am going on board the vessel to-morrow as a sailor boy.'

"Why, Bessie, they will find you out and send you on shore in half an hour. I am afraid that plan wont answer.'

"O, I have thought of all that, and William says that one of the ship's boats will be ashore to take in some of the officers from the 'Lower Fort;' that I must be there and ask them to take me to the ship with them, and when once out to sea they can't send me back.'

"There was something in Bessie's plan that rather interested me, and I willingly assisted her to make the necessary disguise—cutting off her beautiful black hair to the proper length, and collecting such articles as she had forgotten to bring with her, viz., a pair of worsted mittens and a colored comforter for her neck, as they were all helps to assist in the disfiguring process.

"I did not tell papa anything about my project, as I thought it was not worth while to involve him in it, and he could do no good. Bessie slept in my room, unknown to any one, and at early dawn we were up and busy with our preparations. The transport was to sail at eight o'clock, and we had three miles to ride before we could reach the place of appointment; but as papa went on board to spend the last few hours with his friends, we had an excellent opportunity to carry out our designs undisturbed.

"Bessie's lover had provided her with a sailor suit, which was twice too large for her, but we covered up all defects under an overcoat that Mrs. Belson's brother had left at our house, and for the appropriation of which I promised to be answerable.

"You know I am not of a very nervous temperament, but I can assure you my heart beat quickly as we left the house and walked to the coach stand. Bessie was admirably disguised, and the knowledge of her danger seemed to inspire her with courage; for she stepped with a firm resolution, as if prepared to dare the worst. I wore her bonnet and shawl, with a thick veil drawn over my face, and at that hour in the morning did not fear meeting with any of my acquaintances.

"Our ride was a silent one, both hearts being too full for words. We stopped within a few rods of the landing place below the fort, where I paid and dismissed the driver, and then, as we stood on the rising ground, we could see the tall masts and snowy sails of the transport, just coming round the point, while over the blue waves came the expected boat, tossing the white spray from her bows, and steering directly for us, and at the same moment a party of gentlemen came round, a sudden turn in the road on their way to the landing. I never felt so much at a loss what to do in my life, for their inquisitive glances disconcerted me, and I felt that one wrong move now would end poor Bessie's hopes.

"They passed us, gaily laughing and chatting, all but one, and he, after a moment's hesitation, came up to where we stood, and very politely asked if we wanted to 'send a message by the boat.' There was something in his tone and manner so kind and friendly, that I instantly resolved to ask his assistance, and in a few words told him that the boy wanted to go on board, but I feared the sailors would refuse to take him. He gave one quick glance at Bessie, and another at me, and I saw that our secret was known; but my fears were as instantly relieved, for he turned carelessly towards the landing, and said:

"I will do my best to persuade them to take him. But come, my lad, we must not keep them waiting—the boat is here.'

"I held out my hand to Bessie, and I saw the stranger smile as his eyes rested on my fingers with their beautiful rings, so dreadfully in contrast with my common bonnet and shawl, but again he turned away, and I knew that I might trust him.

"I am not going on board myself, but I feel certain that my friends will interest themselves for this young man." He bowed low, and I hastened away.

"For twenty minutes I hurried up the hill on my homeward way, and then I stopped to look for the vessel. She was just opposite where I stood, and half way between her and the shore was the boat, and—O joy!—there was my sailor boy's rough fur cap, in striking contrast to the glazed hats of the men and the neat military caps of the officers. Again I hastened on my way, and now, the excitement over, I could not keep back the troublesome tears that blinded me. A quick step at my side startled me, and there was my new friend.

"Before I could speak, he raised his cap, and with the most respectful bow, begged leave to accompany me to the city.

"You must pardon my presumption, but I am confident you are not used to walking unattended, nor is it proper that you should do so on this road."

"I felt annoyed for a moment, but thinking how kindly he had relieved my anxiety a few minutes before, I conquered my pride and accepted his offer of escort as candidly as he had made it. We stopped for an instant to take a last look at the noble ship, now under full sail and fast leaving the land; and then, as we pursued our walk, I told him Bessie's story, taking care not to give him any clue to my own name.

"I guessed your secret," he said, laughing.

"I knew you did," I answered. "But now that I am within the city, I cannot consent to detain you any longer."

"And so we parted, Mary, and I have never seen him since. We soon after went to Bermuda, and when I told papa what I had done, I was very careful not to say much about my polite friend, for he had such objections to my making acquaintances among his military friends that I thought the least said the better.

"Bessie wrote to me when they arrived in India. She was not discovered until they were far out to sea, and then the gentlemen with whom she had come on board, interested themselves so much about her that one of the officer's wives took her under her protection. The ladies all joined in fitting her out with plenty of clothes, and she was comfortably cared for during the whole voyage."

"And did you never learn your hero's name?"

"No. I never dared to make inquiries. Besides, there were so many officers in garrison at that time that it would have been useless to attempt to find out by describing him."

"And have you never felt as if you would like to see him again?"

"I have, many times. Often, when out riding with papa, I have looked up at the grim walls of the old fort, and wondered if he was there yet, and once when I was shopping in H—, with some ladies of our acquaintance, I thought I saw him crossing the street; but I was mistaken, and they teased me not a little for starting and turning pale at the sight of the handsome Captain Belmont. But what makes you ask me so many questions about him, Mary?"

"Because I think I can tell you the name of your unknown cavalier."

"Nonsense, Mary, you don't mean it."

"I do, indeed. I once heard a young gentleman speak of that adventure in this very room, and from one circumstance of his seeing your hand, I know it must be the same. I could not attempt to repeat all he said about the 'little white fingers' that so cleverly betrayed you; but he is quite as anxious to discover who the 'unknown' is as you are."

"But his name, Mary—his name."

"Captain Percival Stewart, and he is the only son of that dear old Mrs. Stewart that we went to call on last week."

"What! at the little Paradise?"

"Yes."

The day came at last, so anxiously looked for by my cousin, when Violet was to become Mrs. Caesar Diggs, and I was to lose the best cook I ever had.

It was not until the very last minute that Annie was satisfied with her arrangements, and then having hung up the last garland, and pinned the bride's last white ribbon, she ran up to her room, and in a few minutes came down again, looking so fair and beautiful with her white dress and sunny curls, that I could not help clasping her in my arms and kissing her again and again. She was in high spirits and laughed and talked with almost childish glee about the grand wedding, the beauty of the bride, and the comic gravity of the whole party assembled on the occasion.

She had insisted on bearing the expense of the little festival herself, only getting my permission to hold it at our house, and several times during the evening she came to tell me how pleasant it was to see people happy. "I am so happy myself that I enjoy seeing the others merry, too. I feel to-night as if I should never be sad again in the world."

Poor child, at that hour, next evening, she lay prostrate and weeping on her couch, in silence and darkness, suffering the keenest sorrow that could rend her heart. Her father, her kind, indulgent father, was no more! He had died on shipboard, and his child in the first paroxysm of her grief, wildly reproached herself for not accompanying him. It was a severe blow, and for months I tried in vain to cheer her drooping spirits, and divert her mind from the one sad thought that continually occupied her.

The spring came with its birds and flowers, but my cousin had lost all interest in her once loved employments, and passed the beautiful days in her chamber, with closed doors and darkened windows. I was unceasing in my endeavors to save her from the consequences of her injurious indulgence of sorrow, and one day heard some news from a gossiping neighbor that gave me fresh hope.

I hastened to Annie's room and asked her to accompany me on a visit to a sick friend. I expected a refusal, and was prepared to meet it, and so pressingly urged my request that she at last complied, though very unwillingly. I gave her no time to repent of her promise, but hurried her off, and kept her so busy talking that our walk seemed much shorter than it really was.

Looking with astonishment at the house where we stopped, she asked, eagerly, was "Mrs. Stewart ill?" but our entrance prevented my giving her an answer, and as the lady herself came forward to meet and welcome us, Annie said no more until we entered the pretty little parlor, where we found an occupant in the shape of a very handsome, but exceedingly feeble and delicate looking young man.

One glance at my cousin's face was sufficient; I saw she recognized the stranger; and I introduced them, watching at the same time the effect of her voice on the poor invalid, for as such had Percival Stewart returned to his home. After we had conversed some time, Percival appeared to discover something familiar in his companion's tone and manner, for fixing his dark eyes on her, he asked her if it was not possible that they had met before. Annie blushed, and I hastened to say that it was very probable they had.

"I have almost lost my memory, and in fact my mind has become quite shattered from long suffering, but still I have a faint recollection of meeting Miss Weston somewhere before. I wish I could remember clearly." He put his hand to his head, and laid back again on his sofa cushions with a heavy sigh.

I saw the tears in Annie's eyes as she bent over him and half whispered, "Can I help you to remember?" She had drawn off her glove, and as his eyes fell on the thin white hand, a flush of joy for a moment dyed his pale cheek.

"I searched for you till searching was vain, and now when I am dying you have come to comfort me."

He pressed the little hand to his cheek, and closed his eyes as if weary with the effort of speaking.

At this moment, Mrs. Stewart came to the door and beckoned me out. She was suffering much anxiety, and eagerly asked my opinion of the state of her son's health.

"He has so little hope that I am afraid to indulge any myself. God help me if my boy should die! He is my all!"

I comforted the mother as well as I could, and after some farther conversation, we returned to the parlor.

Percival still held my cousin's hand, and I fancied, as we entered the room, that I saw him press it to his lips. Annie drew down her veil and rose to go.

"You will come again soon? Your visit has done me good already."

On my way home I asked my cousin what she thought of him.

"He is dying from low spirits and disappointment," she replied.

"We must try to cure the first, and he will soon be able to bear the last."

"Mary, you will think it strange conduct, but I have promised Percival Stewart that I will be his wife if he lives to claim my hand. I do not think he would have made such a hasty proposal if he had been quite in his right mind; but you see how weak he is, and I did not dare to refuse him."

"But you have done a very serious thing, my little girl. Are you sure that you can love Percival well enough to fulfil your promise?"

"Quite sure, Mary."

It has always been my plan to let love affairs take their own course, having long ago come to the conclusion that interference does no good, and frequently much harm. I had known Captain Stewart from his boyhood, had perfect confidence in his principles, and felt that my cousin could not bestow her hand and fortune on one more worthy.

I soon saw a change in Annie herself. She no longer secluded herself to indulge in unavailing grief, but joined me in my walks and rides as usual, and of course always accompanied me on my visits to the Stewarts.

Percival was long an invalid; but when the autumn sun shone bright and warm on our pleasant old mansion, he had gained sufficient strength to return our visits, and wander through the fine old orchard, plucking the choicest fruit, and weaving garlands for Annie out of my most precious flowers. They were married in the spring, and Annie's home is in the "Little Paradise" she had so greatly admired.

Percival never quite recovered his health, but their ample means prevents all necessity for his exertion, and with his books, his flowers, his music and his lovely wife, he finds numberless reasons to be thankful, and I believe has a grateful appreciation of his many blessings.

Mrs. Stewart still holds her position as housekeeper and head of the family—Annie, with comic horror, having refused to touch the keys or assume the least control. I made no remark, but I knew that, with her usual tact, my cousin had done precisely what she knew would please her mother-in-law; and I felt convinced that she would be a source of happiness to the old lady, who never was blessed with a daughter of her own. My opinion has proved correct.

In the course of our acquaintance, Annie has told me a number of interesting recollections of military life, some of the best of which I intend at some future time to put into readable shape.

A SOFT PILLOW.

Whitefield and a pious companion were much annoyed one night, at a public house, by a set of gamblers in the room adjoining where they slept. Their noisy clamor and horrid blasphemy so excited Whitefield's abhorrence and pious sympathy that he could not rest.

"I will go in to them, and reprove their wickedness," he said. His companion remonstrated in vain. He went. His words of reproof fell apparently powerless upon them. Returning, he laid down to sleep. His companion asked him rather abruptly:

"What did you gain by it?"

"A soft pillow," he said, patiently, and soon fell asleep.

Yes, a "soft pillow" is the reward of fidelity, the companion of a clear conscience. It is sufficient remuneration for doing right, in the absence of all other reward. And none know more truly the value of a soft pillow, than those parents, whose anxiety for wayward children is enhanced by a consciousness of neglect. Those who faithfully rebuke, and properly restrain them by their Christian deportment and religious counsels, can sleep quietly in their day of trial.

Parents! do your duty now, in the fear of God, and when old age comes on, you may lay down upon a soft pillow, assured of His favor who has said, "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it."—Christian Freeman.

The foundation of all virtue is in home, and the cultivation of the social and moral powers by the fireside; and whatever will increase the number of happy homes, will increase the virtue and happiness of the nation.

THE MYSTERIOUS RINGING.

BY EDGAR S. FARNSWORTH.

WE were moving gently along over a smooth sea, with hardly breeze enough to keep the sails drawing. The night was beautifully clear and starlight, and the weather being warm, our watch by the time two bells had struck, unable to overcome the sense of drowsiness with which they were oppressed, on account of having nothing to do, had, with the exception of a youngster on the lookout, stretched themselves upon deck, and not a few of them were wandering in dream-land. Silence reigned throughout the ship. Not a sound was heard but the occasional flapping of the sail against the mast as the wind sometimes died away for an instant and the "measured tread" of the officer of the watch as he paced up and down the quarter-deck.

Three bells were at length struck by the man at the wheel, and were immediately answered by the lookout striking three upon the bell on the forecable. This aroused the sleeping watch for an instant, but seeing every appearance favorable for a continuance of pleasant weather, they one by one dropped off to sleep again, after an injunction from one of the men to the boy on the lookout, to keep a good lookout—not only ahead, but to see if the mate started to come forward; and in case of his doing so, to "rouse 'em up, quicker."

But a little time had elapsed, however, before they were—to use the expression of the old salt "roused up quicker," not by the mate's coming forward, but by a violent ringing of the bell upon the forecable, which brought the sleeping watch to their feet so suddenly, that the very next moment when the officers of the watch came forward, he did not at all mistrust but what that portion of the crew of the old ship Huntress over which he was lord and master, at least every other four hours, was as watchful as set as ever sailed under the stars and stripes.

"Who struck that bell?" said the mate, addressing the watch.

As no one replied, he repeated the question; but not getting an answer, he turned to the boy upon the lookout.

"Joe," said he, "did you ring that bell?"

"No, sir," replied the boy, who was nearly frightened out of his senses by the "thunder-like tones" with which he was questioned.

"Do you know who did ring it?" continued the mate, in the same gruff voice.

"No, sir," said Joe.

"Men, did you hear that bell ring a moment ago?" said the mate, turning to the men.

"Yes, sir," was the immediate reply from them all.

"And does any one know who rung it?" continued the mate. No one replied.

"Singular, indeed," said he "that the bell should have been rung so violently, and yet, nobody knows who rung it; but never mind, it's all right this time, but recollect, if that bell ever rings again, anything more than the regular half hour 'striking,' I shall expect that you will all be able to tell who rung it, in case I should be so inquisitive as to wish to know."

He then turned and went aft, and everything was soon as quiet as it had been before the ringing of the bell; excepting the men were discussing in low tones the affair of the ringing, and wondering who could have been the perpetrator of such an imprudent act.

When our watch went below at eight bells, we had nearly forgotten the affair of the ringing; but we had hardly got "turned in," when what should we hear but the fore-castle bell ringing again, and this time louder than before!

"What the deuce are you ringing that bell for?" sung out the second mate, from the quarter-deck.

The ringing suddenly stopped—but the next instant, the above named officer made his appearance forward amongst the men.

"What in the name of all that's salt, have you been ringing that bell for?" said he. He looked first at one and then another; but they all denied most vehemently having touched the bell-rope, or being within reach of the bell at the time of the ringing.

"One thing is certain, then," said he; "you either lie most prodigiously, or else some lubberly scoundrel in the other watch has had hold of the bell-rope; anyway, it wouldn't be healthy for ye to let me hear that bell ring in that manner agin, that's all."

Having thus delivered himself, he started to go aft, but he had hardly got abaft the mainmast, when ding-ding-ding, went the bell. He immediately turned and went forward again, but this time without speaking, until he had got amongst the men; when he merely remarked that he'd give a month's wages to know who rung that bell. He was interrupted by the oldest man in the watch, who stepped forward and said:

"Please sir, I was standing within four feet of the bell all the while; and upon my word and honor, sir, nobody touched the bell-rope."

"Mightn't it be a ghost that did it?" remarked another old salt. "It's more than once afore to-night I've thought the old ship was haunted; no longer ago than last night, sir—"

"Hush up that gab o'yourn about ghosts!" interrupted the second officer. "I don't believe in the article, myself."

He had hardly ceased speaking, when ding-ding went the bell: but this time only two separate strokes, and not nearly so loud as before.

Reader, if at that identical moment you could have seen the aforesaid officer, you would have been inclined to think that he did believe in ghosts; notwithstanding his disclaimer to the contrary; for his face was, at the least calculation, three shades whiter than before the last two strokes of the bell, and with his eyes fixed upon the rope, at the moment the bell struck.

"By Jove! Jack," said he, turning to the man who first hinted as to the probability of their being a ghost on board, "I agree with ye as regards the old ship being haunted; for I can testify that no live man was near that bell that time, anyhow."

It was now a fixed fact that the bell had not been rung by any one in either watch, and of course, if no one in the ship's crew had a hand in it, it must have been done by some supernatural agency; at least, such was the conclusion the watch upon deck had arrived at, when the captain, who had been awakened by the bell ringing out of time, came upon deck and made his appearance among them.

"What's all this disturbance about, Mr. Ash-ton?" said he, addressing the second mate.

The officer stated the facts to him, as related above, and was "backed up" by the statements of the whole watch; but for all that, the captain did not believe in the existence of ghosts in general, nor on board his ship, in particular. He resolved to investigate the affair himself; and much to the mortification of the second officer, he declared that he didn't believe the bell could ring when he was on deck without his knowing who rung it; but for all that, the bell did ring, the moment he ceased speaking.

He sprang immediately to the bell, and examined it closely; he saw nothing, however, which confirmed him in his belief that the ringing was caused by some one of the crew. The bell-rope was laying upon deck in plain sight, and he was certain that no one had hold of it this time. After giving as his opinion that it was "bloody strange," he went below, and made no further attempts to investigate the matter that night.

We heard no more of the mysterious ringing for some time; and, strange to say, for the past day or two, there had been several things spoken of on board, that did not in any way relate to ghosts.

This state of things was not destined to last, however, for one dark night while our watch were sitting in a group on the fore-castle, spinning yarns, the bell suddenly began to ring. This caused a general stampede from the fore-castle, not one of our watch daring to remain. The captain was on deck at the time and immediately gave orders for calling the other watch; then after sending all hands to the quarter deck, he sent the lookout on to the fore-yard with orders to remain there until called down; then stationed himself within a few feet of the bell to investigate if possible the cause of the ringing. After waiting some time, without hearing anything more of it, he began to curse the author of the ringing, whether man or ghost, when he was interrupted by the bell slowly beginning to toll. If at that moment a hurricane had struck the ship with everything set, he would not have started to his feet quicker than he did then. As before, he examined the bell, but could find nothing in the least out of the way. The bell had ceased tolling, however, upon his starting to his feet.

He made no further attempts to investigate the affair, as he was pretty thoroughly convinced that his men were innocent concerning this matter, if never before.

We heard no more of the ringing during the rest of the voyage; but when we arrived at Calcutta, our men, with one or two exceptions, left the ship, declaring that no inducement whatever could prevail upon them to make the homeward passage in her.

For my own part, I resolved to stick by the ship; for I had no doubt that sooner or later, we should ascertain the cause of the mysterious ringing; and we did the very first night after getting in port, although up to the time of our arrival, I had not the slightest idea of how it was done, nor did any one on board know the cause of the ringing, with the exception of my humble self, until the arrival of the ship at New York.

Close by the after part of the fore-castle where the bell was hung, was a large sheep pen. The top of this pen was about upon a level with the lower part of the bell. Upon the night of our arrival at Calcutta, all hands went ashore, with the exception of the cabin boy and myself. We were to keep an anchor watch until twelve o'clock, then were to be relieved by the second mate, and the only foremast hand besides myself who had not left the ship. The cabin boy had the watch from eight to ten; then, as I supposed, went immediately to his bed. He did not sleep in the fore-castle, with the men; but he and the steward occupied berths in the store-room. I relieved him at ten o'clock, and had not been on deck more than half an hour, when, as I stood leaning against the taffrail, I saw him come sily upon deck and look around.

I thought in an instant that Jim was up to some mischief, and resolved to keep watch of his movements, although I pretended not to see him. Judge of my surprise, when I saw him go forward and climb into the sheep pen.

In a moment more, ding-ding went the fore-castle bell, in precisely the same manner it had done so many times at sea. I now saw through the whole matter. Our whole crew had been nearly frightened out of their senses by the mischief of that boy. Now that I saw through it all, the affair looked so perfectly ridiculous, I burst into an immoderate fit of laughter, and it was several minutes before I could compose myself enough to go forward and ascertain "how it was done."

As soon as I could check my laughter, I went forward softly and tried to look into the pen, but it was so dark I could see nothing. The greater part of the pen was covered with a flat roof. I went aft and got a lantern, and hiding it underneath my jacket crept forward to the pen, and suddenly taking the lantern from my jacket, held it over into the pen. There, underneath the covered part, sat Jim (the cabin boy), with a piece of stout wire in his hand, about four feet in length; and looking decidedly more sheepish than all the regular inhabitants of the pen put together. I burst out laughing again. Jim, upon seeing this, knew that he had nothing to fear from me, so immediately owned up; then showed a specimen of his ringing. The young scamp had left his berth, unnoticed, upon the nights when we had heard the ringing; and having watched his opportunity, had gone forward, and into the pen. The back of the pen was boarded up perfectly tight, but in one of the boards near the top there happened to be a knot which he could easily slip from the board into the pen. He could then put his wire through the knot hole to the tongue of the bell, and ring at pleasure; taking care, whenever they came to examine the bell, to withdraw the wire and slip the knot back.

The knot fitted so perfectly that if we had examined that part of the pen near the bell we never should have mistrusted that the unseen agent of the ringing was within the pen. Jim played a dangerous game, however, for if the captain or either of the officers had caught him at it, we reckon the fis would have all been upon the other side of the question. As it was, I promised not to report him, unless he should get to cutting up more "rustics," but to this day I cannot help laughing, when I think of the circumstances connected with the ringing of that bell.

WORDS OF CHEER.

BY W. A. FOSB.

Onward, onward in the pathway
Which the pure and good have trod,
Never weary, never faltering,
Resting on the arm of God;
Wheresoever duty calls thee,
Where the truth demands thy aid,
Go thou to the mighty battle,
Firmly, boldly, undismayed.

With the flag of justice o'er thee,
And thine own true heart within,
With the hosts of wrong before thee,
Firmly stand amid the din.
As of old, lo! unseen legions
Help thee in the mighty fray,
And the smiles of God's approval,
Like the sunbeams, round thee play.

In the ranks of error are there
Legions 'gainst the little band,
Who for justice, truth and mercy,
Scoffed, despised, insulted, stand?
Heed it not; but if alone
Be thy banner still unfurled,
God and thou at length shall conquer,
Though arrayed against the world.

JACK WILLIS'S VOYAGE:

—OR,—

THE DOUBLE VENTURE.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

"Six knots an hour, and only a fairish breeze. After all, the old Eagle is not to be despised, in the way of sailing."

"You are right, captain; and in the hands of her present commander, I do not doubt that she will be able to show Johnny Bull a good pair of heels, in case of emergency."

"I hope so," answered the first speaker, with a shadow of anxiety on his countenance; for if she should fall into the hands of the enemy, I should be done for most deplorably."

"Ay," rejoined his companion. "You are thinking of a certain agreement between yourself and Wetmore—is it not so? And by the way, if you do not object to imparting your confidence, I would like to be informed a little more minutely concerning the relation which subsists between yourself and Wetmore, and (pardon my mentioning her) a certain young lady of whom you have a pretty high opinion."

"I have no objection in the least, Chesley. And to begin at once, I think I have told you that my first meeting with Lucy Wetmore was at a ball, where I was captivated at sight, and was fully in love from the moment of my introduction to her. Of course, I made it my business to see her again; and persevered, till, as I flatter myself, I succeeded in inspiring some interest in the object of my attentions. My acquaintance with Miss Wetmore commenced about a year before her father's death. While old Peter Wetmore was living, I was forced to pay my regards to Lucy rather 'under the rose,' as the saying has it. The old gentleman was very rich, as you well know, and estimated by many to be worth near half a million. I had nothing, or next to nothing, for I had earned but little, and most of that little had been swept away in the old barque Emerald, which was lost just about the commencement of the war. You knew Mr. Wetmore pretty well, and therefore may be aware that he had a great horror of fortune hunters, and kept a very suspicious regard on the train of admirers who clustered about his daughter. It was a very natural feeling, after all, and I cannot blame him much for it. But under the circumstances, it was impossible that I could gain anything by thrusting myself in his way. Indeed, Lucy and I talked the whole matter over together. She assured me that she had no thought of mercenary design on my part. We were young, and we could wait. I was determined to rise in my pursuit. When I got to be master of a good ship, and had acquired the reputation of one or two prosperous voyages, then it might be safe to show my designs more boldly.

"Several months afterward, Mr. Wetmore died. In his will, he left to his daughter the sum of fifty thousand dollars on the arrival of her twenty-first birthday. The sum of thirty thousand dollars was to be added on her attaining the age of twenty-five. The whole bequest, however, was holden under the following condition: That if, during the life of her brother and without his consent, she should marry a gentleman possessing less than forty thousand dollars in his own right, then the bequest should revert to her brother. Furthermore, while Lucy remains unmarried, George has the commercial use of these sums, giving security by mortgage, and paying a small percentage of interest."

"Capital!" observed Chesley, interrupting the course of the narrative. "The old gentleman has arranged a nice little scheme for keeping the daughter out of the bonds of matrimony. But if I am right, there is some understanding between you and George with regard to this."

"Exactly so. I will put the conclusion in a nut-shell. George Wetmore was not long in learning the attachment which existed between myself and Lucy. Nor was it intended that he should be kept in ignorance of its existence. At last Mr. Wetmore and I had a talk about the matter. He told me that he had no disposition to go to extremes—said that he was willing to do what was right and fair, as far as he understood—and many other things which I can't now recollect. Finally, he told me that if I succeeded in closing up this present voyage safely, and secured the net profit which was hoped for (about a hundred and fifty per cent.), then he would stand neutral; and if Lucy gave me her hand, he would, for a reasonable bonus, affix his consent to the marriage contract. So here am I, Mr. Chesley, on a double venture; first for ship and owners, and last, but not least, Lucy and her eighty thousand dollars. Mr. Chesley, I hope you will believe that the money weighs little with me, in comparison with my thought of her. And I suspect that I should be selfish enough to ask her to be mine, if the marriage swept off every dollar of her fortune. But you were brought up in wealth, and you enjoy its benefits still. You can understand, therefore, why I dread to think of the sacrifice of all her property, and of the thousand comforts and privileges its possession can alone ensure her."

While Captain Willis was speaking, his friend regarded him attentively.

"I was never very intimately acquainted with Miss Wetmore," he replied, when the other had finished. "I have heard that she has the reputation of being a little coquettish; but she hardly looks it, to my idea. I am certainly not ready to believe that she would wantonly deceive so estimable a young fellow as Jack Willis. At all events, I am willing to take it for granted that all is straight between you and your lady love. But to speak plainly, I have no faith in George Wetmore beyond the extent of absolute legal obligation. He is not troubled with any nicety of moral principle, and will not hesitate to trample on the rights and feelings of others in order to promote his own interest. I have had dealings with him, and know the truth of what I say. He will not scruple to deceive you, to overreach you, and to cast you off altogether when you have served his purpose. And, Captain Jack, to speak honestly, I believe that George Wetmore has not the slightest idea of giving consent to a marriage between yourself and his sister, and that he would, on the contrary, throw every obstacle in the way of its occurrence."

"You surprise me, Chesley," he replied. "I have always found the Wetmores fair dealers, both father and son. Surely, you must have stated matters rather strongly?"

"It may be so," answered the other, after a short pause, wherein he seemed busy in thought. "Men are not always the same to different persons and under different circumstances. My statement may be a rather strong one."

The conversation ceased. Captain Willis, with spirits slightly depressed by Chesley's words, rose from his seat and went on deck. Hardly had he arrived here, when his ear was greeted by a familiar sound, but one less pleasing now than it would have been in other times.

"Sail ho!" shouted a voice from the foremast head.

"Where away?" cried the master, leaping into the main rigging.

"On the larboard quarter."

"Mr. Matson, hand me the glass, if you please," said Captain Willis, mounting still higher. "As I live," was his muttered soliloquy, while he carefully examined the stranger, "we are in for it, that's certain. Mr. Jones," he said, as he coolly made his way down to the deck, "just see that every sail tells to its utmost. The breeze is somewhat fresh, but I think we can clap on a little more aft. At any rate, give her all she will bear; only see that you don't get her by the head. Cutter or no cutter, we will see what the fellow astern is made of. There's no doubt of one thing, and that is that he has got his mind made up for a slap at the old Eagle. It's not our business to fight with such fellows as long as we can run away; so we'll try the part of discretion for the present. Helm there, luff a little. So now, steady."

The tall masts bent under their weight of canvas, while the Eagle, leaning over from the breeze, rushed through the foaming waves. Captain Jack cast a look aloft, and satisfying himself that everything there was doing its duty, called his men aft and made them a pithy address, which was received with three hearty cheers; and each man proceeded to the post assigned him in case of action.

"No fears of them, Jones!" said Captain Willis, as he met the glance of his officer. "They well know the mercies of John Bull's prison-ships, and will not readily put them to the trial without a little fighting."

It was about sunrise when the strange sail was discovered. The Eagle was then some twenty leagues from the north shore of Cuba, with the wind at northeast. In two hours time the stranger gained so far upon the chase, that Captain Willis was able to verify by the glass a suspicion which had already entered his mind.

"That's her among a thousand!" he exclaimed, shutting the glass with a jerk. "It's the Alert—one of the fastest vessels in the British navy, as I know to my cost. Well, well—if the cutter cuts us down this time, it won't be without our leaving at least the mark of our teeth upon her."

The brig continued on her former course, save that now and then her head was brought a little closer to the wind. This management was not uncriticised by some "old salts" of the fore-castle.

"Jim," said one, "what's in the old man's noodle to keep her up this way? I should think that rascally cutter gained full fast enough upon us already, without our trying to help her any."

"Can't say, Ben," replied the other. "But there's some crotchet or other in our captain's main-top, or he wouldn't be doing things this sort. Depend on't, we shall see before long what it means. There it is again. 'Luff—sheets aft!' work before us, Ben!"

At one o'clock the land was in full view, right ahead. The sailors obeyed the orders of their officers in silence, looking at each other in surprise.

"Jerusalem, Ben!" at length exclaimed a grizzle-headed Yorker. "Here's a fix! The skipper has put us where there isn't a ha'penny's chance to get clear; and if he knows what he's going to do, it's what I don't know."

"Call Black Bill," said Captain Willis.

The order was transmitted, and out of the cook-room came Bill, grinning with delight.

"Well, doctor," said the captain, "are you sure that you can accomplish all you promised? Can you put the good brig safely in?"

"Guess em can, massa," said the negro, bowing and scraping his foot with all due deference. "Know him berry well, massa. Many time come from Barbadoes here. Know him well, for sarten, massa!"

"Very well, doctor," replied Captain Willis; "I believe we must put you in pilot. There's no time to lose, for the tide has begun to ebb already. But mind what you're about, darkey. We'll make a man of you, if you do the thing as it should be."

The negro was duly installed upon the quarter. Every feature in his face seemed impressed with conscious importance. But "Black Bill" was no common serf. The royal blood of Ashantee coursed in his veins, and his new dignity at once developed in him a naturally strong and acute perception. The orders which issued from his sable lips were prompt, well directed and effective. His former acquaintances of the fore-castle looked on him with astonishment.

Very soon, the Eagle opened a narrow passage between two headlands, on one of which was situated a small lighthouse. Here was the entrance to the tide harbor of Carrena, a port which had long been deserted by all commerce, save that of the little island coasters. The harbor was unsafe for anchorage of vessels of large size, and the entrance to other than an adept was peculiarly troublesome. But "Black Bill" was evidently at home. He noted the filling of the sails, the objects on shore, the bearing of the light; every change necessary in disposition of ship was accurately and promptly executed. In little more than half an hour from the time of entrance, the Eagle was at anchor near the town.

Late in the afternoon, the English cutter lay off the headlands which guarded the entrance into the harbor. Captain Tracy impatiently paced the quarter, and ever and anon cast an eye to leeward, as if debating within himself in what manner he should further proceed.

"Hab blue-fish, massa? Berry nice blue-fish, massa. Good for 'tomach. Help um appetite, massa."

"Be off, you black scamp!" shouted the lieutenant.

Captain Tracy glanced at the countenance of the disappointed black, who was slowly turning away his boat.

"Jameson," said the commander, "you may tell the fellow to come aboard. He may possibly be of use to us."

"Hallo, darkey!" cried Jameson. "We'll take some of your fish, if you'll bring them aboard, and tell the steward how to dress them."

"Ki! not know how cook blue-fish? Ki-hi! Wall, we tell him."

Sambo was quickly on deck, and in close confab with the captain's steward, when Jameson called him away.

"Boy," said the lieutenant, "do you suppose you could show us a passage into yonder harbor?"

Sambo's eyes rolled with ecstasy, as he grasped the silver Jameson placed in his hand.

"Hi, massa! 'Pose I can. Have carry ship in afore now, many time, more'n I can count."

Captain Tracy, who had been overhearing the conversation, now stepped forward.

"Look here, boy!" said he, displaying to the greedy gaze of the negro several tempting gold pieces. "Look here. You say you can carry us into the harbor. If you do it safely, here is the reward you shall receive. But if you deceive us, or attempt to play the rogue in any way, this is the reward which we shall give you."

And the speaker drew from his breast-pocket a pistol, whose muzzle turned in quiet significance upon the negro. Poor Sambo started at sight of the weapon; his face turned of a slaty pallor, while he ejaculated, with broken utterance.

"O, massa—don't! don't! Frighten poor niggah berry much, sah! Hab great dislike to loaded gun, massa."

"Stop, stop, Sambo!" said Jameson, who with much difficulty restrained his laughter at the ludicrous terror of the negro. "The captain wont hurt you, so long as you play us no tricks and tell us no lies. Do you know enough about the harbor to show us a safe passage in?"

"Yes, massa—I tole you so afore. Know ebery ting about de harbor. Hab 'tand pilot much to sa'sfaction of commerce. But must wait now, till tide down on de bar yonder."

Tracy smiled, and turned to his lieutenant.

"Jameson, we must try it, I think. Were it not for the mishap which occurred to our two boats, we might be spared a slight risk. Put Andrews at the wheel, and keep a good lookout a-head. We must move as soon as the flood will permit. Our sable friend appears to have some knowledge of what he undertakes, but we must trust to him as little as possible."

Some time elapsed before the tide admitted passage over the bar which the negro had indicated. Meanwhile, Jameson took pains to sound the new comer concerning the landmarks and directions of the somewhat tortuous passage, and became convinced that the pilot, although simple and unsophisticated, was by no means devoid of intelligence and the knowledge conferred by observation and experience. Jameson communicated this conviction to his commander, who, when the moment of action arrived, felt a corresponding security regarding his movements.

"You are sure of your course?" was the anxious inquiry, as the cutter moved rapidly through the gathering shadows of night.

"Yes, massa—keep um light right ober de quarter."

"Well, sir, remember what will happen to you if you lead us into difficulty."

"Yes, massa. Know um berry well. Hab 'tand pilot berry much to sa'sfaction ob—"

He did not finish the sentence. A sudden shock made the vessel quiver in every plank.

"Furies!" shouted Captain Tracy, in a hoarse voice, springing from the deck on which he had been thrown by the violence of the shock. "The black scoundrel—by heaven he's gone! Hard-a-weather—hard-a-weather, man! Tacks and sheets—be lively there! We must have her aback, Jameson."

It was of no avail. The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when there came another shock, a grating and groaning, and the noise of water gurgling between decks.

"Jameson," said the commander, "see that our two remaining boats are in readiness; but be cool and steady. We must not forsake our poor Alert as long as she holds life and breath."

Half an hour afterward, the light of white sails came glimmering through the night.

"The rascally Yankee!" groaned Jameson, as the brig came rushing past.

"Know um berry well, massa!" shouted a well known voice from the deck of the Eagle. "Keep um light ober de quarter!"

In little more than a fortnight afterward, the Eagle was again fast at the southern side of Long Wharf. Fifteen minutes later, and Captain Willis had reached the counting-room of Wetmore. The latter expressed himself much pleased with the result of a voyage which he was informed had netted him two hundred per cent. profit. Nevertheless, he had much regret, he said, to be the bearer of intelligence which doubtless would cause disappointment to his esteemed friend. His sister was at present in New York, but had left in his care a letter directed to Captain Willis. The latter hastily read the note, which was in the handwriting of Lucy Wetmore. The purport of it informed him that the writer was much grieved at the necessity of declaring that her feelings had undergone a change, and that the relation which had formerly existed between them must henceforth cease. The close contained the additional intelligence that she had just become engaged, and would shortly be married to a merchant of New York, with whom she would return to Boston. There were frequent expressions of continued friendly regard to Captain Willis, and of sorrow at the disappointment which her words would be likely to cause him. With feelings of the bitterest chagrin, he crushed the letter in his hand.

"The business of the voyage must be finished at once," he said. "By to-morrow eve, I am ready for sea once more."

In an hour afterward, he hastened across the Common to the residence of Chesley, who had just arrived from the vessel. The captain received a warm welcome from his friend.

"What fortune?" inquired the latter, with a meaning eye.

"Read that," replied Willis, throwing the crumpled paper on the table near which they stood.

Chesley ran his eye over Lucy's note, and his face was flushed with indignation at its contents.

"I do not blame you for being a little down in the mouth," he said, "considering the turn which things have taken. But believe me, the fit wont last very long. You are well rid of her, captain. There cannot be much heart in the girl, if, after having carried things so far, she turns you off in this cool way. For my part, I think that you have reason to congratulate yourself on your escape."

This well-meant speech had little effect towards soothing the pain which Willis experienced. He reached forth his hand to take the letter. But Chesley prevented him.

"Hold," he said. "Permit me to glance at this once more."

"Captain Willis," he added, after a momentary examination, "I wish you to leave this note in my keeping for a day or two. I have an object in view which I will not mention to you just at present. I give you my word that no improper use shall be made of the letter. And, by the way, there is a Miss Leeds here, on a visit to my sister. Our fair guest is well acquainted with Lucy Wetmore, and very probably can inform me of the actual whereabouts of that young lady—a point concerning which I have some curiosity."

He was absent from the room a quarter of an hour or more, at the end of which time he returned with a countenance plainly expressive of satisfaction in the intelligence he had obtained.

"If I am not mistaken, friend Willis," said Chesley, "we shall soon find a little light shining through the cloud which now overhangs you. If you will call on me to-morrow forenoon, between eight and nine o'clock, I may be able to give you information which will be for your advantage. Miss Wetmore has been at Watertown for nearly a month, and so—but stay! Whom have we here?"

A carriage stopped before the street door, and the driver, descending, applied himself to the knocker. In the carriage, which was open, sat Lucy Wetmore. Chesley, with the intention of anticipating the servant, flew down stairs and presented himself at the door. The driver had been charged to inquire if Miss Leeds was within. Chesley answered in the affirmative, and then, as if suddenly recognizing the occupant of the vehicle, stepped forward to the carriage and offered a courteous greeting. Inviting the lady to descend, he added a few words which produced a very visible agitation in her whom he addressed. Presently, accepting his assistance, she alighted, and with him entered the house. Willis could hardly contain himself during the minutes which elapsed before Chesley again returned to him. At length, his friend presented himself. His countenance was cheerful—even elate.

"I wish you joy, my lad," he cried; "for I think that a very short time will suffice to put an entirely different face on this matter. Come down, and pay your respects to Miss Wetmore. Miss Leeds and I will shortly leave the coast clear for your honorable self, when I have every reason to believe that you will have no difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory understanding with the lady of your regards. The fact is, my dear sir, that letter is a flam—a shameful forgery. I suspected it to be so the moment that I gave the note a particular examination, and the fact is now made plain to me."

Willis descended to the parlor, where the unaffected kindness with which Miss Wetmore received him did much to re-assure his hopes. Before she left the house, he had the pleasure of knowing that her sentiments toward himself had remained unchanged, and were like to remain so—notwithstanding the arts of her brother. When Willis communicated the state of affairs to Chesley, the latter was delighted with the added proof of his own penetration, and asserted his opinion that the play (as he expressed it) was rapidly drawing to a close.

"It so happens," he said, "that I have certain facts in my possession, which, if divulged, would seriously affect the reputation of Wetmore, not only in his private, but also in his business relations. It seems to me, now, that their publicity would affect him even more than I had once supposed. He is aware of my knowledge, to some extent; and I had occasion to tell him, near a year ago, that his way, henceforth, must be pretty straight in order to avoid disclosure of the facts to which I refer. As he has conducted himself so basely in this matter between you and his sister, I have no scruple in using both my powers of persuasion and my powers of compulsion to induce him to give his consent to your marriage with Lucy. I think that my efforts will be successful. Whether my opinion be correct or not, time will quickly discover."

The event proved him in the right; for, in the first week of August, there appeared in the city papers the following announcement, contained in the list of marriages:

"On Wednesday, at the residence of George Wetmore, Esq., Captain John Willis to Lucy, only daughter of the late Peter Wetmore."

In one or two of the journals there appeared, in celebration of the event, certain verses, which now rest in quiet oblivion with thousands of like effusions which have followed, or gone before. The wedding was a gay and brilliant one; and it was remarked by many of the guests, that their obliging host had made every preparation which could add to the zest and enjoyment of the occasion, and that he was, doubtless, well pleased with the match which had taken place.

MY LOVE.

BY H. J. A. EDWARDS.

In spring, when nature's waking smile
Is mingled oft with glistening tears,
My love is fond and true the while,
Rejoicing in life's early years.

In summer, when the fields are fair,
The groves with cooling shade invite,
I wander forth to meet her there,
While eve's dim hue fades into night.

How quickly then the moments fly,
Concealed by the fond dreams of youth,
When clouds veil not the beauteous sky,
And fancy, brilliant, seems as truth.

In autumn, when the drooping fringe
Hangs loose upon the golden corn,
I see, alas! no ruddy tinge
Upon her cheek in quiet morn.

When the bright frost has killed the flower,
And leaves are stripped from every tree,
Then comes the sad and lonely hour,
Which steals my love forever from me.

In winter, when the snow is deep
Within the churchyard damp and cold,
My love is sleeping her long sleep,
And white the snow and damp the mould,
In winter when the snow is deep.

THE CONSCRIPT:

—OR,—

THE PRICE OF PEACE.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

THE day has dawned sad and gloomy. The roll of the drum has been heard since morning; the labors of the field are suspended; the inhabitants of the village are stationed by groups in the streets, and discussing, in a low tone, the summonses of the young people summoned to put their hands in the fatal urn.* Every face wears an expression of anxiety, as if some calamity threatened the country. Each sighs and raises eyes to heaven as he passes by certain houses not as tombs. A few more hours, and sounds of joy or sobs of sorrow will issue thence! Now relatives, a prey to anxiety, remain sad and motionless, watching and fearing the progress of hours which are to bring them joy or despair. The young people, in the meantime, keep up their courage, and laugh and sing as they prepare to go to the place where the drawing is to be. But their laugh is hollow, their voices tremble, and their forced gayety deceives no one. In fact, the fearful experiment of this day is to see how many conscripts are, in France, drawn by lot.

decide their whole existence. Must they soon leave this village where they were born—their relatives, their comrades, their betrothed ones? for in the country, people marry young. At twenty, a young man has almost always made his choice. It is too soon—but what is to be done? Custom decrees it thus; and while in the fashionable world we see every day men of forty years and more marry young girls, a youth of twenty-eight rarely finds, in this country, a young girl who will marry him.

The bell of the church was ringing; the pastor was about to celebrate mass to invoke for the conscripts the protection of Heaven. All were present, accompanied by their families. Never had they prayed with such fervor. When men are powerless, the most skeptical have recourse to Providence; they are happy then to believe in Providence, for chance is blind and deaf!

The mass finished, the drum again sounds; it is the signal of departure. There are embraces, encouragements, and the conscripts march; the fathers accompany their sons; the mothers return to their homes to pray once more; the young girls sigh, and the silence of death reigns in this village, usually so brilliant and gay.

The fable relates that in the days of King Minos, the inhabitants of the Isle of Crete were compelled to deliver each year seven young men, and as many young girls, to satisfy the appetites of a monster called the Minotaur. A man, a prince, a demi-god killed the Minotaur and delivered his country. Who shall deliver us from war? What was this Minotaur, compared to that thousand-headed hydra who absorbs men by hundreds, thousands, millions? who changes wheat-fields into fields of battle? who makes the earth drink blood like water? who compels the nations, under penalty of entire destruction, to fell ranks of men like forest-trees? who removes every year from the family, from agriculture, from industry, the elite of the people? who makes widows by hundreds and orphans by thousands? who breaks the hearts of mothers and lovers, and who disgusts us ever with glory, when we think of the price which must be paid for it? Who shall deliver us from war?

"Louise, what o'clock is it?" said, for the twentieth time since the departure of the conscripts, one of the poor mothers, a prey to the suffering of anxiety and uncertainty.

"Two o'clock, aunt," replied a beautiful young girl, with a sad and pensive air.

"Only two? This day will never end!"

"Alas, poor aunt," replied the young girl, "if the news is to be bad, it will come soon enough!"

And she embraced the mother with filial tenderness.

"True, my child, but if you knew how painful this uncertainty is!"

"Shall I go a little way to meet them?" said she. "I can see from afar the colors of the ribbons, and will run to tell you. You will know your fate a few minutes sooner."

"Do so, my daughter; as for me, I cannot walk. Anxiety has taken away my strength."

"I will go," said Louise. "But do not worry—what good will it do?"

And she went out, leaving the poor woman to her sad thoughts. When she had gone a few steps, she encountered one of her companions.

"Come with me to meet them, Charlotte," said she to her. "I am ashamed to be seen going alone; but my aunt sent me."

"Why, then, should you be ashamed?" said Charlotte. "Is not Jean your betrothed?"

"Jean is not my betrothed, any more than his mother; but I love them both as a sister, and I ought to do so, for my aunt has been a good mother to me."

"I think so. A niece who has two acres of land and a house of her own may well be taken care of, where one has two sons!"

"I do not know what her idea is," said Louise; "but she has never mentioned it to me."

"And they?"

"Still less! They look upon me as a little girl. Remember that I am only sixteen."

"Why, then, have neither of them made a choice elsewhere?"

"I do not know—ask them."

"But, according to your ideas, which is the best?" persisted Charlotte.

"They are both good, and I love one as much as the other."

"That is well," said Charlotte, laughing; "so if Jean goes, Jacques will still be left you."

"Let me alone," said Louise, pettishly; "I am not ready to talk of marriage! But apropos of Jacques," pursued she, "it is a bad sign that we do not meet him, for he promised, if his brother had a good number, to hasten home to tell us."

"O, he will remain to drink with the rest!"

"He is not in the habit of it!" said Louise, angrily.

"May we not jest a little about the boys?" said Charlotte; "they say what they please about us!"

"My cousins never speak evil of me, I am sure, and I will not hear it said of them."

"Your cousins! your cousins! Be easy—nobody will eat them."

At that moment the sound of the drum, heard in the distance, interrupted the conversation of the two friends. Very soon cries and songs were intermingled with it, and the conscripts appeared at a turn in the road. Louise became very pale.

"Do you see him?" asked she, with emotion.

"Not yet—they are too far off; but I shall soon be able to distinguish them."

There was silence. The two young girls looked earnestly. Suddenly Charlotte exclaimed:

"I see Jean! I see Jean!"

"Where?" said Louise, anxiously, for her short sight did not permit her to distinguish yet.

"Louise, you will marry Jacques," said Charlotte; "Jean is a soldier!"

"My poor aunt!" exclaimed Louise, clasping her hands.

At this moment, a young man detached himself from the group of conscripts. It was Jacques, who, having recognized his cousin, hastened to meet her. Her face was pale and anxious, and even if Louise had not then perceived the tri-colored ribbons with which Jean was decorated, the expression of his brother's countenance would have informed her of his misfortune.

"He has the fourteen!" exclaimed he, angrily, as he accosted the young girls. "My mother will be sorry, for she prefers Jean."

"She loves you both well," said Louise, without daring to deny the fact, which was known to every one; "but how shall we tell her this bad news? She sent me to meet you, and now I dare not return to her."

"Nor I," said Jacques.

"Well," said Charlotte, "you can both go. She has but to look at you to know the result, for you are as pale as if you came from the other world."

"She is right," said Louise.

And the two cousins, quickening their pace, took the road to the village, preceding the conscripts. * * * *

Since the departure of Louise, her aunt had not moved. Seated in a low chair, in the corner, by the extinct fire, she was absorbed in sorrowful reflections, with her head buried in her hands. The door, left open, permitted the two young people to enter without being heard, and they were consulting each other with a look to ask what was to be done, when the poor woman, shaking off her torpor, suddenly stood up. Then only she perceived her niece and her eldest son, motionless before her.

"Ah," said she, falling back into her chair, "Jean is a soldier!"

Both remained silent. The poor mother asked no questions; but she burst into tears. There could be no ray of hope, since Louise did not tell her to hope! The latter sat down by her, took her hand, which she pressed tenderly, and silently mingled her own tears with hers.

"Well, are you all crying here?" suddenly exclaimed a conscript, as he entered the house. "Good morning, mother; good morning, Louise; good morning, Jacques!" And he sang in a husky voice the song of departure.

The poor youth evidently made all this noise to conceal his regret; and repeated libations taken at all the cabarets of the route, had much to do with his resignation and good humor.

"My poor child!" exclaimed the mother, springing towards him, as if to defend him against an immediate danger; "they will kill me! they will kill me!"

"Do not cry, mother," said the young man, clasping her in his arms; "you will end by making me cry too, and I have no desire to pass for a coward among my comrades; that would not do for a soldier. What do you say, Louise?"

"My poor Jean!" said she, embracing him.

"What would you? I would rather have remained here in peace, to plant my cabbages, and perhaps by-and-by we might have been married; but now I have no chance. So much the better for Jacques."

"We need not talk of that," said Louise; "am I not the sister of you both?"

"For the present, sly one," pursued Jean, appealing to his brother, who, when he spoke of marriage, had cast down his head with an air of constraint.

"Louise is too young to talk of that," said the latter, with effort; "and besides, her position with our mother and her orphan condition impose the greatest reserve upon us. When she has attained her majority, she can choose for herself."

"I am rich," suddenly exclaimed Louise; "I am rich, and Jean is as a brother to me! Do not weep, aunt—Jean shall not go!" And she left the house, running.

M. Michaud, the guardian of Louise, whose godfather he also was, lived at the other extremity of the village. It was towards his house that she directed her steps. She entered it, all out of breath, and found her guardian occupied in taking his repast, in company with his son, a youth of about eighteen.

"Ah, it is you, goddaughter," said he, with his mouth full; "will you eat a bit with us?"

"Thank you, you are very kind; but I am not hungry—my heart is too full."

Then, as the impassible guardian continued to eat, without saying anything, she asked:

"You know that my cousin Jean has been drawn by lot?"

"He will make a fine grenadier," said M. Michaud, tranquilly.

"But, godfather," persisted Louise, "I do not wish him to go; do you not understand?"

"O, you do not wish him to go! But what will you do about it?"

"I will purchase a substitute."

"Ah," said the guardian, laying down his fork, "you have money then?"

"No, godfather," said Louise, embarrassed, seeing the expression of her godfather suddenly change; "but I have property, and you know it better than any one, since you are my godfather. This is the reason I came to find you, for Jean must not go."

"Why so, if you please?"

"Because his mother will die."

"That would be a pity; but what can I do about it?"

"Give me the means to redeem Jean by selling a little of my property."

"You do not know, then, that at your majority I must give an account to the last cent?"

"Well, it seems to me I have the control of my own property."

"A minor has the control of nothing. You must be twenty-one, or have a husband, before you can dispose of a cent; and your husband would be dissatisfied when I come to render an account, if I should dispose of your fortune thus."

"O, as for that, godfather," said Louise, blushing, "you need not be afraid about the future, for I shall perhaps marry one of my cousins, and Jacques could not reproach me for saving his brother—still less Jean, if I should marry him."

"Then you do not know which?"

"No, godfather; I had never thought of it until to-day—I am so young! But, on reflection, it is the best thing I can do. My aunt is a good mother to me, and I shall perhaps never like any one better."

"But your cousins are too old for you, who are only sixteen."

"I like it better so, godfather; it seems to me that if my husband was of the same age as myself, I could not respect him."

M. Michaud made a slight grimace.

"You are a child," said he; "in a few years, you will perhaps think otherwise."

"I do not believe it, godfather. But the business, at present, is to ransom my cousin—we can talk of the rest by-and-by."

"I tell you that it is impossible, and that neither you nor I can dispose of your property before your majority."

"And if I should marry immediately?"

"At sixteen! I would certainly not allow you to commit such a folly—you are too young! It will be soon enough when you are twenty-one; if you wish to make a foolish marriage then, you will be your own mistress, but not before."

"My good godfather, I entreat you!" said Louise, supplicatingly.

"I tell you it is impossible," said M. Michaud.

The good Louise had really believed that nothing could be easier than to ransom her cousin. On seeing her hopes disappointed, she began to weep bitterly.

"My poor aunt, she will die!" said she. "Men are so hard-hearted!"

"I am hard-hearted because I will not let you ruin yourself. But I know my duty," said M. Michaud, with importance.

"Adieu, godfather!" said Louise, going towards the door. "I am sorry to have disturbed you." And she went out discouraged, sighing.

On re-entering her aunt's house, she found her as she had left her, in company with her two sons; for on seeing Louise go out, she had suspected the step she was about to take, and had detained Jean, until she could learn the result.

As for Jacques, he had incurred his mother's anger, by seeking to make her comprehend the vanity of her hopes.

"I will go in his stead," said he, suddenly. "The state demands but one soldier—what matters it? Is not this a good idea, Louise? What say you to it?"

"I say that it is you whom I love!" exclaimed Louise, throwing herself tearfully into his arms. "Whether you go or stay, I will have no other husband than you!"

"Is it possible? and I was going, thinking you loved Jean."

"As a brother," said she, extending her hand to the conscript. "But you shall not go. I will ask my guardian to let me marry you immediately, and then we will ransom our brother without needing his permission."

"No, Louise—no, that must not be; you are too young. It would be wrong to profit by a moment of excitement, which you would perhaps regret afterwards. Besides, seven years of my life do not seem too much to purchase the right to consecrate to you the rest."

"Ah, you are noble and good, and I love you!" said his mother, suddenly. And she embraced him as she had never done before. *

"It is strange!" said Louise to herself, on the evening of the same day. "Where were my eyes, that I did not perceive the difference between the two brothers? Jean is a handsome youth, doubtless, but common, coarse; while Jacques always appears like a gentleman. And then what a good heart he has!"

At the expiration of a month, the widow announced to her neighbors that her son Jacques, after having accompanied his brother to the regiment, had returned with a fever. A week more passed away; at last the invalid went out, and showed himself. It was Jean! Judge of the commentaries, the conjectures, the exclamations! Godfather Michaud said nothing, but he wrote to the prefect to inform him of this substitution of one person for another. The prefect, in his turn, wrote to the minister of war, who wrote to the colonel of the regiment where Jacques had enlisted instead of his brother. The colonel replied that Jacques was his best recruit, that he would make an excellent soldier, and that it was of very little importance that he had taken the place of his brother, since he filled it honorably—so that the affair remained there, to the great displeasure of M. Michaud, who was still persuaded that Louise loved Jean.

As for Jean, he was of too vulgar a nature to comprehend all the delicacy and greatness of his brother's conduct. Delighted, at first, to be liberated, he at last came to the conclusion that Jacques loved to travel, and desired a military life. Six months after his brother's departure, he offered himself to Louise, who refused him without hesitation.

"I love you as a brother," said she; "but do not speak to me thus, for I shall despise you and consider you my enemy."

"But if Jacques should be killed in war?" persisted Jean.

"I would put on mourning and remain all my life faithful to his memory."

"As you please; then I will marry Charlotte."

In fact, from this moment Jean declared himself the lover of Charlotte and their marriage soon took place.

Two years passed thus. Louise was eighteen. M. Michaud, re-assured by the marriage of Jean and Charlotte, at last unmasked his batteries and proposed that his ward should marry his son. But the latter declared that she would await her majority before she made a choice.

About this time, she received a letter from Algiers. Jacques was in Africa, and was a sergeant. From this day, poor Louise had not a moment's repose. How could she, when he she loved was exposed to the balls of the enemy, to danger from fever, to the teeth of lions? Her only occupation was now to read the newspapers. She eagerly sought the news from Africa. One day, she read as follows:

"We regret to announce that a part of the garrison of Nemours has just been destroyed by the heroic imprudence of its chief, who has himself found death in this unfortunate affair."

The paper fell from the hands of Louise. Nemours! The last letter of Jacques was dated Nemours! Poor Louise! At her request, M. Michand wrote to the minister of war to learn the names of the men killed in the affair of Sidi-Brahim. A week afterwards, he received the list. Jacques's name was among the first!

Louise now renounced all hope and devoted herself to the education of her little godson, the eldest child of Jean and Charlotte. He came to her every morning and spent the day with her. One morning little Jacques arrived very animated.

"Godmother," said he, "will you give me leave to go and see the soldiers?"

"What soldiers?" said Louise.

"Those who are to pass the night here. They are going to Paris to be reviewed; there will be two of them at our house."

"By-and-by," said Louise, pensively. "The day is long; you will have time to see them."

The child pouted a little, and then began to spell with a bad grace in the book which his godmother placed before him. At the end of ten minutes, he stopped.

"Do you hear the drum?" said he.

"Yes," said Louise; "let the drum go, and continue your lesson."

The child sighed, and finished the page. After the lesson, they breakfasted as usual. Suddenly a double knock was heard at the door.

"Enter," said Louise.

The door opened, and an officer, thin and of dark complexion, appeared on the threshold.

"Pardon me, madame," said he to Louise, as he saluted her, "but I am taking my rounds! Have you any soldiers quartered here?"

"No, sir," said she, somewhat troubled; "I live alone, and never lodge any one."

"Madame is a widow?" said the officer, pointing to the black dress of the young girl.

Louise bowed, without replying. She was willing that this stranger should ascribe to her a title to which she felt she had a right.

"You have a charming child, madame," said the soldier, approaching Jacques.

"It is my godson," said Louise, blushing.

"It is astonishing," continued the officer, looking at the child, "how much he resembles a comrade whom I knew in Africa!"

"You have been in Africa, then?" said Louise, falling back into her chair.

"Yes, madame," said he, taking the one to which Louise pointed; for, incapable of standing, she felt that she ought also to invite the stranger to be seated.

A thought had occurred to the young girl: Could this soldier, who resembled little Jacques so much, have been—? A word would have dispelled her doubts, but she hesitated to pronounce it, lest the officer should utter a name unknown to her. She was silent for a moment to taste one sweet hope, like the prisoner, who, awaking after a dream of liberty, keeps his eyes shut that he may not see the bars of his prison! The officer had taken little Jacques in his lap, and was looking at him attentively.

"Does he remind you of some deceased friend?" at last asked Louise.

"He of whom the child reminds me is not dead, madame, although he has long passed for such! Escaped as if by miracle from a horrible massacre, a prisoner two years among the Arabs, he has been able at last, after infinite fatigue and suffering, to rejoin his flag."

"And—you left him in Africa?" asked Louise, in a stifled voice, while she stealthily observed the countenance of the officer who, on his part, manifested much emotion.

"No," said he. "On arriving at the regiment, exhausted by his long suffering, he obtained leave to retire from the service, and at present, has returned to his country."

At this moment, the hurried eyes of the soldier encountered those of Louise earnestly fixed upon him.

"It is Jacques! it is you!" exclaimed she, at last rising.

His only reply was to extend his arms to her.

"Louise," at that moment exclaimed the voice of Charlotte, "lend me some money, I beg of you. Jean has come home drunk again, and I have not a cent in the house."

Jacques smiled at Charlotte, who, surprised to find a soldier with her friend, had remained fixed in the threshold.

"Here, sister Charlotte," said he, presenting a gold piece to the young woman. "Louise and I are coming to sup with you."

"His sister!" said Charlotte, looking at Louise.

"It is Jacques!" exclaimed the latter.

"Impossible! he is so dark, so thin—and that beard! And then he is an officer!"

"A captain, my good sister," said Jacques, embracing her.

"But," said Louise, "you were only a sergeant when you arrived in Africa!"

"True; but in a campaign, one is soon promoted. And then balls and fevers do not respect officers any more than soldiers, so that those who fall give place to others. I succeeded a lieutenant who was killed, and when I escaped from captivity, he who had replaced me had just died of dysentery, and I re-entered the same regiment; then the general-in-chief, learning my return, appointed me captain."

"You will not return, then," said Louise.

"No," said he, smiling, "unless my life here should be made unhappy."

"But," pursued she, "why did you not inform us of your return?"

"I had my reasons for that; I had long passed for dead, and wished to know for myself how my resurrection would be received. After three years of silence, you might have been married. I wished to return here as a stranger, examine the ground, and depart without making myself known if I had been forgotten."

"Here is a surprise!" said Charlotte. "Jean will be happy, for he has regretted you much—even though he has become a drunkard."

"He will reform," said Jacques, smiling; "I will talk to him and you shall see."

"I will run and find him," said she, "and I am sure he will leave the cabaret quick, now!"

"No, do not; I wish to surprise him."

Little Jacques had profited by these explanations to run after the soldiers. The captain, in his turn, took the road to the door.

"Will you leave me already?" said Louise.

"I must return for an instant to the mayor's office to speak to M. Michaud. He did not recognize me just now, and will be surprised."

"And what is your pressing business there?"

"To give him your name and mine. To-day is Wednesday, and we must be published ten days, which will permit us to marry next week on Saturday."

GETTING AND SAYING.

It is not so much of an art to get money as to save it. The proverb tells us that any fool can do the former, but it requires a wise man to accomplish the latter. Still there is no need of being avaricious, like Lady Hardwicke, the lady of the Lord Chancellor of England, who loved money as well as he did, and what he got, she saved. The purse in which the Great Seal is carried, is of very expensive embroidery, and was provided, during his time, every year. Lady Hardwicke took care that it should not be provided for the seal bearer's profit, for she annually retained the purse herself, having previously ordered that the velvet should be of the length of one of the state rooms at Wimpole. So many of them were saved that at length she had enough to hang the state rooms and make curtains for the bed!—Eastern Argus.

BOILING A TEA-KETTLE.

Which is the most trying to a woman—a greenhorn of a servant girl, or a stove that "wont draw" the day she expects company? Mrs. Jones hired the other day, a Miss McDermott, just from Cork. Miss McDermott was ordered "to boil the tea-kettle."

"The what?"

"The tea-kettle."

"An' do you mane that?"

"Certainly—if I did not I would not have ordered you to do it—and be quick about it."

"Yes, ma'am."

Miss McDermott obeyed orders. In about half an hour afterwards Mrs. Jones resumed the conversation.

"Where's the tea-kettle, Bridget?"

"In the dinner-pot, ma'am."

"In the dinner-pot!"

"Yes, ma'am. You told me to boil it, and I've had it on the scald for an hour."

Mrs. Jones could bear no more. She had a rush of blood to the head, and went into a swoon. The last we saw of her she was carried up stairs in an arm-chair.—N. Y. Spirit of the Times.

JUDICIAL INTEGRITY.

Judge Sewall, of Massachusetts, who died in 1760, went one day into a hatter's shop, in order to purchase a pair of second-hand brushes for cleaning his shoes. The master of the shop presented him with a couple. "What is your price?" said the judge. "If they will answer your purpose," replied the other, "you may have them and welcome." The judge, on hearing this, laid them down, and bowing, was leaving the shop, upon which the hatter said to him: "Pray, sir, your honor has forgotten the principal object of your visit." "By no means," answered the judge. "If you please to set a price, I am ready to purchase; but ever since it has fallen to my lot to occupy a seat on the bench, I have studiously avoided receiving the value of a single copper, lest at some future period of my life, it might have some kind of influence in determining my judgment."—Granite Freeman.

THE GREATEST WONDER YET.

Calvin Edson, and all the fat women, dwarfs and giants, are eclipsed by a man now on exhibition at Havana, who was born without either legs or arms, but who, having tenaciously set himself to work to conquer the inconveniences naturally consequent upon such deprivation, has made himself a wonder by the variety of his feats. Among other things, he announces that he is able to spin a top with such perfection that it will hit any spot named, to spin a dollar over a table, and put it in his left ear and take it out again, to make a knot with a halter, to thread a needle, to ascend and descend a ladder, to uncork a bottle with a corkscrew, to load a fowling piece and kill anything designated, or put out a candle with a simple wad—quite enough wonders for a man without either legs or arms.—Hingham Patriot.

Thorough knowledge only enables a man to think more justly.

FEMALE GAMBLERS.

In this country we have few or no female gamblers; and let us not malign our fair countrywomen by crediting the fact to the want of opportunity. Opportunity is never wanting where any passion is to be gratified. Let us rather attribute a freedom from this scathing and blighting vice to the high tone of mind and morals which seeks for a healthy excitement in ennobling deeds of charity and the refined pleasures of cultivated society. It is appalling to contemplate a man with his whole soul engrossed in the chances of the gaming-table; at one moment raised to the acme of feverish hope, at another plunged into the depths of a rayless despair. It is harrowing to watch his tremulous hand as he stakes the price of his children's bread with it, or draws towards him those guilty winnings which are only a snare and a temptation. What then must it be to a woman under such circumstances! Yet this is a common enough spectacle abroad, at the continent watering-places, and particularly at Baden-Baden, where gaming is authorized, and one of the real, if unconfessed, attractions of the place. An English lady thus records some of her observations on the conduct of her sex at the gaming-table, and the picture is a terrible one: "On no occasion did I watch higher play than on the evening of the dress ball. All the best company in Baden were assembled; the birds of prey, whose profession it was to watch them, doubtless, came armed for the encounter, and prepared to 'fool them to the top of their bent.' The following day was Sunday. We passed through the public walks on our way to church; and having time to spare, looked into the rooms, which even at that early hour had a crowd of people hanging round the gaming-tables. On our return, we entered them again, and then this frightful scene of madness was at its height.

"I doubt if anything, less than the evidence of the senses, can enable any one fully to credit and comprehend the spectacle that a gaming-table offers. I saw women, distinguished by rank, elegant in person, modest, and even reserved in manner, sitting at the rouge et noir table, with rateaux and marking cards in their hands; the former to push forward their bets and draw in their winnings, the latter to prick down the events of the game. I saw such at different hours through the whole of Sunday. To name these is impossible; but I grieve to say that two English women were among them. There was one of this set whom I watched day after day during the whole period of our stay, with more interest than, I believed, was reasonable; for had I studied any other as attentively, I might have found less to lament. She was young—certainly not more than twenty-five—and though not regularly nor brilliantly handsome, most singularly winning both in person and demeanor. Her dress was elegant, but peculiarly plain and simple. A close white silk bonnet and gauze veil; a quite-colored silk gown, with less of flourish and frill by the half than any other person; a delicate little hand, which, when ungloved, displayed some handsome rings; a jewelled watch of peculiar splendor, and a countenance expressive of anxious thoughtfulness must be remembered by many who were at Baden, in 1833. They must remember, too, that enter the rooms when they would, morning, noon or night, still they found her nearly at the same play, at the rouge et noir table.

"Her husband, who had as unquestionably the air of a gentleman as she had of a lady, though not always close to her, was never very distant. He did not play himself; and I fancied, as he hovered near her, that his countenance expressed anxiety; but he returned the sweet smile with which she always met his eye with an answering smile; and I saw not the slightest indication that he wished to withdraw her from the table. There was an expression in the upper part of her face that my blundering science would have construed into something very foreign to the propensity she showed; but there she sat, hour after hour, and day after day, not even allowing the blessed Sabbath, that gives rest to all, to bring it to her; there she sat, constantly throwing down handfuls of five franc pieces, and sometimes drawing them back again, till her young face grew rigid from weariness, and all the lustre of her eye faded into a glare of vexed inanity. Alas! alas! is that fair woman a mother? God forbid!"

THE BODY AVENGED.

By too much sitting still the body becomes unhealthy, and soon the mind. This is Nature's law. She will never see her children wronged. If the mind, which rules the body, ever forgets itself so far as to trample upon its slave, the slave is never generous enough to forgive the injury; but will rise and smite its oppressor. Thus has many a monarch mind been dethroned.—Longfellow.

Brood no longer, ye dreamers, but awake, shake off your sloth and work, and when you work, look to it that you work in the right direction! Not for fame, for it will cheat you; not for what you call happiness, for it will slip from your grasp. Ascertain your duty, and then discharge it.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

THE PRESS AND THE SWORD.

Bulwer says that "in the hands of men entirely great the pen is mightier than the sword." We, Americans, who claim to be entirely great, have found the means of uniting these powerful engines of civilization. We have brought columns of type to support columns of infantry, and covered the cannon of the artillery with the "shooting-sticks" of the printers. The army that marched into Mexico was largely recruited by disciples of Faust, so that, on one occasion, when General Scott, wishing to issue a proclamation, requested on parade that if there happened to be a printer in the ranks he would advance, two hundred stalwart men stepped forth two paces to the front. A day or two after the occupation of Matamoras by the American troops, the swarthy denizens of that old rambling town were startled by an unusual cry from the lips of an old gray-headed fellow, with a bundle under his arm, who, in a strange jargon of Spanish and English, proclaimed: "Here-ers the Republica of the Rio Grande and Amigo de los Pueblos—only one beet (bit)!" As he shuffled along the rectangular streets, there was none to impede his progress but the throng of customers. No policeman, with his badge, stopped the old boy to ask if he were licensed. Even the sentinels, along whose channelled bayonets flashed the rays of a noontide sun, forgot to challenge him: it was enough that he was a "member of the press," and on he passed. The dark-eyed and half-clad señoritas, spite of their languid habits of indifference, bent from their casements and gazed at him with a wondering interest. The sombrero-shadowed Mexicano lifted his corn-cob pipe from his lips, and perhaps a Carrajo! ascended with the smoke. And such was the avatar of the American press in Mexico—an historical event. The papers published in the different cities of Mexico during the campaign were really very creditable affairs. Their typographical appearance was as good as could be expected under the circumstances; they were edited with much ability, and many of their issues were spicy and sparkling. We hope that copies of all these papers have been preserved.

REMEMBER.—Good sense and sound reason should be the staple of our writing and speaking.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

Some writer says, "women govern everything, because they govern those who govern everything." Their influence is not the less powerful, because, like the dew of heaven, it descends unseen. Though the fairer and better portion of humanity do not appear on the rostrum—and Heaven forbid they should!—yet as mothers, as wives, as sweethearts, their counsels are probably felt in the halls of legislation. In the old days of Rome it was said that Numa Pompilius consulted with the nymph Egeria on affairs of state. If Randolph of Roanoke had not lost his Egeria in early life, his public career would have been very different. Many, perhaps all eminent statesmen of modern days, have had their female counsellors. Madame de Stael was the adviser of Benjamin Constant in his happiest days, and the beautiful and unfortunate Madame Roland of her husband. Still later, we find Madame de Krudener, whose oracles were consulted by the Emperor Alexander, and the Princess de Dino, so propitious to the mind of Talleyrand, to whom she supplied wit and repartee. Many of the smartest sayings of this old diplomatic fox originated with this accomplished lady. The Countess de Meulan was the friend and adviser of Guizot, Louis Philippe's famous prime minister. But Guizot was also under the influence of the Princess de Lieven, one of the most famous political blue-stockings in Europe. It is observable, by the way, that while the lords of creation rely upon female wit for support and counsel, female sovereigns very rarely employ female counsellors. This tends to balance the reciprocal influence of the sexes in the government of the world.

COST OF DRESSING THE LADIES.—The imports of silks have risen in value since the year 1847 from less than $12,000,000 to over $24,000,000, and the customs from $1,833,850 to $6,129,583.

THE REASON.—A gentlemanly thief, detected in the exercise of his profession by a lady of this city, stated that "the times were so hard that he was obliged to steal in order to live."

Ballow's Dollar Monthly is the cheapest magazine in the world—Office Branch.

VANITY FAIR.

"Vanity of vanities!" exclaimed the wise man—"all is vanity!" And looking abroad in the world around us, how many proofs do we hold of the truth of the axiom. There is vanity in that gaudy bonnet, with its costly lace—the sweep of those voluminous silken skirts—the unnecessary display of those dainty French coats at the cleanest of street crossings. There is vanity in that male D'Orsay-ish figure, with its curled hair, its diamond breastpin and its sparkling ring on the finger. But not alone in raiment and fine linen does vanity stalk abroad. In that garb of more than Puritanic plainness—the positive extreme of attire—is quite as strong a proof of vanity as the tailor's gorgeous walking advertisement that just preceded it. Does not the wearer seem to say, "Look at me! How rich mecker—how much holier I am than these gaudy butterflies of fashion that hover and flutter about me!" As proud a heart beats under that sober kersey as beneath that satin boddy or that embroidered vest. When Satan was walking in the environs of London,

"He saw a cottage by the wayside,
A cottage of gentility,
And he duly smiled, for his darling vice
Was the pride that apes humility."

But pride and vanity have been doomed to fall, even in the days of "Lucifer, son of the morning," this blessed Anno Domini. Christopher North somewhere tells a story of a young preacher who was one of the vainest of mortals. On one occasion he delivered a discourse on which he particularly prided himself, declaimed in what he considered a fascinating style, and produced, as he fancied, the profoundest impression. But among the auditors who seemed to be most attentive and moved, even to tears, was a poor man in widow's weeds, who hung upon his words and seemed to devour every word he uttered. Attracted by this attention, our youthful hero lost time in learning her name and calling on the widow. She told him how much she was interested in him and the cause.

"My poor husband," said she, "was a gardener. We lived on the produce of a little plot of ground. He used to carry the vegetables to market in baskets on the back of a faithful little donkey. At last it pleased Providence to remove my poor husband to a better world. Then I was left alone with my donkey, and went to market myself. But misfortunes never come single. The donkey died, too. You can't think, how much I was attached to him, and how much I miss him. Now, yesterday, the moment I heard you, the tones of your voice reminded me of my poor donkey, and I couldn't help shedding tears—indeed I couldn't. I know it was wrong to be thinking of a poor animal in such a sacred place, but I hope I shall be forgiven, for you were so like him that indeed I couldn't help it, sir."

It is needless to say, that after this explanation the visitor hastily took leave, and that his countenance was not quite so concoited in its expression as when he entered the presence of the mourner.

BOARDING HOUSE.

The life of a female boarding-house keeper must be a wretched one. If the lady who wrote the following advertisement finds customers who comply with her terms, she will be fortunate: "The gentlemen must not put their feet on the mantel in winter, nor out of the window in summer, and the lady must not write her name on the glass with a quartz pin. If she uses an airtight, she must regulate the damper herself, and not ring every ten minutes for the chambermaid. The single gentleman must not play the trombone, nor make love to the servants, nor comb his whiskers at the table. If he does, he won't answer. The lady must not turn up her nose at everything on the table, unless she has a natural pug, and none of the party must drink or talk with a mouthful of victuals, nor must they fight for the top buckwheat cake. Terms liberal, board to be paid weekly in advance." This is certainly an odd mode of inviting customers.

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY.—Once introduced to the family circle, this wonderfully cheap and charming magazine is sure to become a great favorite. Its cheerful pages should gladden every fireside in the country. As long as bright eyes love to read delightful stories, its success must continue.—Weekly Albion.

We might fill our pages with commendatory notices like the above. The success of our Magazine has surpassed all former experience which we have gained in the publishing business. It is already second in circulation to but one other magazine in the world!

MORBID CURIOSITY.—The silver cream jug from which Sir John Sadlier is said to have drunk poison, lately sold in England for $128, far above its value; and the rope which hanged Palmer was divided into inch bits and sold for a fabulous price. Poor human nature!

CASH.—The word "cash" is derived from the Italian cassa, the chest in which merchants keep their money. "A powerful gentleman is Senor Don Cash," says an old Spanish song.

PATERNAL ADVICE.

Jack Muggins! you have announced to us your intention of embarking in the next Liverpool steamer, to make what you call the "tower" of Europe, and you ask our advice upon the step, as people usually do after having fully made up their minds. Since you have honored us by requesting the expression of our opinion, we will give it to you for what it is worth: Don't you go. We think we see you opening your eyes, caressing your incipient mustache, and preparing to ask "why not?" We will therefore anticipate your question, and reply: In the first place, you are too young. We know that the blood of Young America rises at that suggestion, but we repeat that you are too young. Scarcely a year has passed since the ashes of the paternal Muggins were deposited in their resting-place at Mount Auburn, and not three since you came to years of discretion (?) and the possession of the handsome fortune left you by your progenitor. Youth and fortune combined under certain circumstances, are glorious prerogatives, but you, Muggins, do not possess those circumstances. You are young, but you are very green; rich, but very careless, and European capitals abound in sharpers that out-Yankee Yankee sharpers. You would come home shorn like a sheep; but more resembling that other quadruped so amply furnished with auditory organs.

And again, Jack: you do not know enough about your own country. A wealthy American, travelling abroad, is beset with interrogatories respecting our history, our institutions, our products, our manufactures, and our arts; for somehow or other, in spite of prejudice and incredulity, the idea has crept abroad that this is "a great country." Now we are constrained to say, Jack,—and we do it in no spirit of unkindness,—that your information on these subjects is extremely limited, and that you would find it difficult to substantiate even the single proposition which embraces the Alpha and Omega of your historical knowledge, viz., that "General Washington fit the Battle of New Orleans." Remember that every travelling American is to a certain extent the representative of his country, and has it in his power to increase or diminish the respect for our flag.

But, if you know little about our own country, you know still less about Europe. Your geographical deficiencies are of no account. Travel is the practical study of geography; and you would soon discover that Rome is not situated on the Neva, and that Great Britain is not an island of the Grecian Archipelago. But it is absolutely necessary to know something of the history of the old world before visiting its celebrated places. You can't get up any enthusiasm about sacred localities, if you learn the event and its memorial at the same time. Besides, you know nothing about architecture, painting and sculpture, and it is art more than nature that challenges your admiration abroad.

Moreover, you speak only your own language, and that very incorrectly! Hence you would be compelled in self-defence to associate abroad only with Americans and English, and what sort of a change would that be? And you would have to see with the eyes and think with the minds of couriers, ciceroni and valets de place.

Our word for it, young man, you are not ripe for travel. Think better of your project, even if its abandonment costs you the forfeiture of your passage money. Get books and masters; read and study for five years, and then go abroad and you will travel with pleasure, improvement and credit. Such, Jack Muggins, is our advice, and there are many in your plight who would be benefited by the same counsel.

DUELLING.—Gustavus of Sweden had a very comfortable way of arranging duels. Two officers once called on him and asked his permission to cut each other's throats according to the code of honor. He consented, and, having intimated to them his intention of witnessing the combat, at the appointed hour appeared on the ground. Then turning to the officers who were about to engage, he said, "Now, gentlemen, fight—fight till one of you fall. And I have brought the provost marshal with me to behead the survivor." It is remarkable how suddenly the gentlemen discovered they could reconcile their differences without fighting.

A HANDBOOK OF TRAVEL.—That incorrigible wag, Punch, advertises "A handbook of travel round a lady in full dress, with a large folding map showing the utmost limit of patience and crinoline to which the circumference, as recently enlarged, at present extends."

QUERIES AND ANSWERS.—What fruit is most like the capital of Maryland? An apple is (Annapolis). What tea is universally used in the United States? Liberty. Why ought short persons to be fondest of the letter T? It makes all tall.

THE ALTERNATIVE.—An idle girl, recently arraigned before our police for some offence, was offered her choice between the House of Correction and a husband. She chose the latter as the lesser evil.

THE MODERN LANGUAGES.

Mr. Richard S. Willis, in a recent number of his excellent journal, the "New York Musical World," illustrates very forcibly the importance of an acquaintance with the modern European languages, and particularly French, to Americans going abroad for instruction or even amusement. Most of our travellers lose nine-tenths of the enjoyment and information they might acquire through this deficiency; and it is well known that many of our ministers and consuls, otherwise well educated men, cut a sorry and ridiculous figure in Europe, and fail of attaining the purposes for which they were sent abroad by our government. He says: "Without rushing into an extreme, and decrying all study of the classics, as men are perhaps prone to do on having their eyes opened, on the contrary insisting on them as the best allies in gaining the modern languages, I would as strongly insist, that from the freshman, or the first academic year onward, a course of French, at least, should industriously be pursued. Better one book of Greek or Latin the less, and one of a modern language the more. French will at least save a man from embarrassment and mortification—with this he saves his credit."

Mr. Willis also alludes to the importance of untravelled Americans acquiring at least the two great modern languages—German and French—with four or five millions of our own countrymen (by adoption) speaking the former. In view of the foreign immigration, he thinks it "not befitting" or even "paying, that this free-masonry of foreign languages should be filling our air—that men with whom we are daily trading and trafficking and politicizing should talk side over the shoulder to their companions, and we know not a word they are saying, or planning, or plotting."

There is much in these hints worth pondering and acting on. Charles V. said: "Every language which a man acquires renders him another man;" so that the man who should be master of five hundred different languages, of which specimens were recorded by Professor Adelung, would be equal to a little army. The acquisition of a modern language is not the terrific task used to be when the initial step was the swallowing an octavo grammar and a thick lexicon. Labor-saving processes have been introduced in mental operations as well as manufactures; old time has been discarded, and it is very possible for a student of energy to acquire in a few months a sufficient knowledge of French or Spanish to enable him to make himself understood and to transact business in their languages.

There is no excuse for Americans being behind-hand in this matter, for they have a remarkable faculty for the acquisition of foreign tongues.

PENMANSHIP.

We do not think half the attention is paid to penmanship in our days that used to be in the good old "slow and sure" times. The hurry of the age has led to a neglect of this accomplishment. But there is no economy of time in illegible writing. If a hurried scrawl saves time to the penman, it imposes a heavy sacrifice of time on the victim who is doomed to decipher it. Rufus Choate's manuscript is the despair of printers. It is generally believed that men of genius write a very obscure, infirm and eccentric character—such as Byron, Chalmers, Jeffrey and Napoleon. Their thoughts flow too rapid to permit good mechanical execution. Washington wrote a fair, manly, straight-forward line, every letter legible and distinct, while his namesake, Washington Irving, writes a perfect lawyer's hand, as though he wished no one to read it but himself. Edmund Burke's hand was uneven and hurried; Lord Brougham writes a hasty hand, but with a good pen and full of ink. Wellington's notes were exceedingly hieroglyphical; and Dr. Chalmers seems to have written with the feather end of his goose quill.

A REMARKABLE TOWN.—In the town of Harrison, Westchester county, N. Y., consisting of a population of upward of 2000, says an exchange, there is no church, unless the dwelling-like meeting house of the Quakers may be called one. The town has no minister, no lawyer, no doctor, and no drug store.

FOR EVERY FIRESIDE.—No family in the land is too poor to afford Ballou's Dollar Monthly. What a fund of pleasure and innocent enjoyment its visits afford to the home circle! What sweet sensibilities its well written stories give rise to; how delicately yet effectually is the goodly moral conveyed. The more of such works that parents put into the hands of their children the more enlarged views of life, the more refinement, and the more domestic pleasure will be disseminated.—Saturday Courier.

COMPOSITION.—In composing, as a general rule, run your pen through every word you have written; you have no idea what vigor it will give your style.

BENEVOLENCE.—There is an old lady in Greenbush, N. Y., so careful of her property that she wont allow her geese to go into the water without life-preservers attached to each.

IS IT TRUE?—A Mrs. Sally Sly says that "when a man marries he goes to the penitentiary for life."

THE INFIRMITIES OF GENIUS.

The errors and infirmities of genius have generally been treated in two ways, both alike erroneous. One party, making no allowance for the temptations that beset genius, both from within and without, have stigmatized its faults with unfeeling, unmanly and unphilosophical harshness, judging the erring man of genius by a severer rule than they would apply to common mortals; while another set of men have sought to extenuate and find apologies for every aberration from the right path on the part of the man of uncommon gifts, as if genius conferred an exemption from the rules of common morality. The time has arrived when men view this subject in a clearer light—or, rather, perhaps, the sphere and immunities of individuals are better defined. A man is no longer ostracised merely because he is a poet, or painter, or a sculptor, cut off from sympathy and regarded with suspicion, because differing from the mass in his taste and capabilities. But in fact, genius is no longer such an anomaly, because taste and talent are nearly universal, and men stand altogether upon a more level footing.

In speaking of Burns, Christopher North says: "While the hypocritical and the base exaggerated all that illustrious man's aberrations from the right path, nor had the heart to acknowledge the manifold temptations strewn around his feet, the enthusiastic and generous ran into the other extreme, and weakly—I must not say wickedly—strove to extenuate them into mere trifles—in too many instances to deny them altogether; and when too flagrant to be denied, dared to declare that we were bound to forget and forgive them on the score of the poet's genius—as if genius, the guardian of virtue, could ever be regarded as the pander to vice and the slave of sin. Thus they were willing to sacrifice morality, rather than that the idol set up before their imagination should be degraded; and did far worse injury, and offered far worse insult to Virtue and Religion by their slurring over the offences of Burns against both, than ever was done by those offences themselves; for Burns bitterly repented what they almost canonized; and the evil practice of one man can never do so much injury to society as the evil theory of a thousand. Burns erred greatly and grievously; and since the world knows that he did, as well from friends as from foes, let us be lenient and merciful to him whose worth was great; but just and faithful to that law of right, which must on no consideration be violated by our judgments, but which must maintain and exercise its severe and sovereign favor over all transgressions, and more especially over the transgressions of those to whom nature has granted endowments that might have been, had their possessors nobly willed it, the ministers of unmingled good to themselves and the whole human race."

These opinions, calmly expressed, must carry conviction; and the more especially since the individual selected for illustration was one whom the writer both admired and eulogized.

SIZE OF THE WEST.—Illinois would make forty such States as Rhode Island, and Minnesota sixty. Missouri is larger than all New England. Ohio exceeds either Ireland, Scotland or Portugal, and equals Belgium and Switzerland together. Missouri is more than half as large as Italy, and larger than Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland. Missouri and Illinois are larger than England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales.

MOUNT HOLYOKE.—On the top of Mount Holyoke, on a clear day, ten mountains can be seen; one in New Hampshire, one in Vermont, one each in New York and Connecticut, and six in Massachusetts. The spectator always sees lying below him, thirty towns in Massachusetts, and six in Connecticut.

POETRY.—Literary productions in rhyme and metre do not comprise all poetry. The prose of Irving and of Hawthorne embodies the essence of true poetry. And, moreover, "the written poem is only poetry talking, and the statue, the picture, and the musical composition, are poetry acting."

NATURAL.—A female physician in Philadelphia advertises that she can cure all sorts of diseases, but particularly affections of the heart. This was always a speciality of ladies—and also to cause the heart-ache.

TO MAKE PRIME VINEGAR.—Mix one quart of molasses, three gallons of rain water and one pint of yeast. Let it ferment and stand four weeks, and you will have the best of vinegar.

OLD TIMES.—When Bishop Berkeley preached at Newport, in 1729, he wrote home, "The town of Newport contains 6000 souls, and is the most thriving place in all America for bigness."

FUDGE.—The grant of a right to use a coat of arms in England is obtained by applying at the Herald's College, and paying about $400.

A CURE FOR INTEMPERANCE.

It is said that the worst use you can put a man to is to hang him. The next worst use is certainly to flog him. To lay the lash upon the backs of men to whom the honor of their country's flag is committed, on shore and afloat, is only to degrade them hopelessly, and break their spirit. This principle has been long recognized in this country, and is beginning to make its way abroad. Such were the views of a British officer in command of a regiment in Guernsey. Yet he was in a trying position, for liquor was cheap on the island, the soldiers would get drunk, and the lash had usually been resorted to as a punishment for the intemperate and a terror to their comrades. Accordingly this humane officer (we are sorry that we cannot recall his name) appealed to the honorable feelings of his men, resolved at the same time to make drunkenness as unpleasant as possible, without, however, resorting in any case to the lash. He issued an order saying that he would not flog, but trust to the soldier's self-respect for keeping sober on duty.

Next day a man was found drunk and confined. The colonel, accompanied by the surgeon, went to the guard-house and felt the man's pulse. He was declared to be in a fever. Nothing could be truer. He was therefore rolled in a blanket, and four soldiers bore him through the barracks, his comrades all laughing at the care taken of him. On reaching the hospital, the patient was put to bed and blistered between the shoulders, fed on bread and water for a week, and then discharged cured. He was then brought on parade, when the commanding officer congratulated him on his recovery from the fever, and sent him to join his company, where he was laughed at and jeered by his comrades for the space of a week. Many others underwent the same treatment, but the joke, though very amusing to the temperate, ceased to be so to the inebriates. The experiment was completely successful. Not a man of that regiment was flogged in Guernsey after the blister system had been introduced, and in a fortnight after its inauguration, there was no such thing as a man drunk on parade; though the regiment had previously been in a notoriously bad condition.

THE CONFESSION OF A FOND MOTHER.—Over-indulgence, like too much sugar, only spoils at it was meant to sweeten.

FRENCH INGENUITY.—We have got plenty of dines on our coast, but it requires French ists to put them into boxes.

FALSE PRIDE.

False pride—if indeed any sort of pride is otherwise—is a very ridiculous littleness. There are men who would blush up to the eyes if detected in carrying home a bundle. Yet this sort of pride frequently has a fall, and necessity sometimes works a radical cure. One of our dandy officers in Mexico, who, when in New York, voted it vulgar to carry an umbrella, made nothing of marching to his quarters the bearer of a roasting pig and greens, captured in a foraging excursion. Chief Justice Marshall, when living at Richmond, gave a lesson to one of these over-nice gentry. Nothing was more usual than to see him returning at sunrise with poultry in one hand and vegetables in the other. On one of these occasions, a would-be-fashionable young man from the North, who had recently removed to Richmond, was swearing violently because he could hire no one to take home his turkey. Marshall stepped up, and ascertaining of him where he lived, replied, "That is my way, and I will take it for you." When arrived at his dwelling, the young man inquired, "What shall I pay you?" "O, nothing," was the rejoinder, "you are welcome—it was on my way, and no trouble." "Who is that polite old gentleman who brought home my turkey for me?" inquired the other of a bystander, as Marshall stepped away. "That," replied he, "is John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States." The young man, astounded, exclaimed: "Why did he bring home my turkey?" "To give you a severe reprimand, and teach you to attend to your own business," was the answer.

MARRIAGE.—Dr. Franklin advises a young man in search of a wife to take her "from a bunch," because, in a family where there is a group of damsels, emulation induces them to improve and cultivate themselves, whereas only daughters are apt to be spoiled children.

MONOPOLY.—All the sword blades made for the English army are the work of four men, three of whom are brothers. There is a secret in the mode of manufacture, known only by these four, and which they jealously guard.

AGRICULTURAL.—The crop of hops was very large this year. It will be larger during the dancing season—which will also develop the corn crop.

WATER.—It is stated that there are 261 miles of pipes laid to supply the city of Philadelphia with water.

Foreign Miscellany.

Thebes, in Egypt, presents ruins 26 miles round. It had 100 gates.

A census just taken in Greece shows the population to be 1,043,251 souls.

A man in England in pulling down an old house he had bought found 2003 guineas.

The censorship of the press has been rendered still more rigorous in St. Petersburg.

The late Crimean war has swept away the savings of England's forty years of peace.

The rumor is revived of a Congress on the affairs of Italy, to which the principal Italian States will be invited.

At Antwerp, on the 17th ult, there was a brilliant celebration in honor of the twenty-five years' peaceful reign of the King of Holland.

The widow of Lord Byron is yet alive and hearty. She has recently purchased the residence of the late poet Rogers, in London.

The Russian government is about to send out next month from Cronstadt, two corvettes on a scientific voyage round the world.

The number of newspapers published this year in Switzerland, which has a population of 800,000 souls, is 263, being twelve more than in 1855.

The grape disease is reported again to have appeared in the Canary Islands, to the despair of the people.

Marshal Lannes's widow, just dead, was one of the loveliest women of the first imperial court.

Lord Clarendon has received from the American government testimonials to be presented to British seamen for services rendered to American vessels in distress.

Mr. Heald, the young Englishman of fortune who married Lola Montez shortly after her separation from the king of Bavaria, died at Falkstone, England, last month, of consumption.

An original sketch of a Holy Family, painted by Raphael for Francis I., of France, has just been discovered in Florence. The possessor of this treasure is an Italian refugee.

Madame Pfeiffer, the celebrated female traveler, is on her way to Madagascar, into the interior of which savage country she intends to penetrate.

Sardinia contains over 9000 schools, with over 400,000 pupils, besides numerous classical institutions, and three great universities with over 6000 students.

The height of that sacred spot, Mount Zion, is two thousand five hundred and thirty-five feet above the level of the Mediterranean Sea, and about three hundred feet above the valley below.

It is calculated that £12,000,000 have been spent in draining and subsoiling land in Ireland during the last ten years, and an immense increase in production has been the result.

At the Crystal Palace in London, when the fountains are in operation, they have 11,788 jets playing, and the quantity of water displayed simultaneously in them is about 120,000 gallons per minute.

There are in Russia 6000 miles of telegraph used for government messages.

In England they post the "Times" leaders in the country towns like bulletins.

A cunning Frenchman has invented a parasol which serves also for a fan.

Paris proper has increased two hundred thousand in population since Louis Napoleon's first assumed sway.

The two Chambers of the States General of the Netherlands have voted funds necessary for converting all the paddle steamers of the Dutch navy into screws.

The Council of the Order of St. Maurice and Lazarus of Piedmont has subscribed the sum of 2000*fr.* for the ordnance intended for the fortification of Alessandria.

The Sisters of Charity have purchased a large property at Baktche Pacha, on the Bosphorus, for the purpose of establishing an hospital for the aged of both sexes.

In the interior of Peru there has been discovered a beautiful tunnel under a river, the work of the old Inca Indians, and a lasting proof of their civilization.

A singular phenomenon lately took place at Rouen, France, about 11 o'clock at night. An immense cloud of small white moths burst over the town, and completely covered the ground in a very few seconds.

Mr. John Frost, a chartist, who returned to Newport, England, lately, after fourteen years' banishment, was received by hundreds of people, who dragged him along the streets in a coach dressed with evergreens.

In London, out of a population of two and a half millions, only five hundred thousand attend church. In Liverpool, the proportion of attendants on public worship is about one third of the population. The case seems pretty much the same in all great cities.

Paper is now made in Belgium from refuse tanned leather. After the tanning is washed from the leather, about twenty per cent. of old hemp rope is mixed with the scraps, and the whole is cut up and reduced to a pulp, from which the paper is made.

Mormonism is making such rapid progress in Denmark as to cause the religious and reflecting part of the inhabitants to look with dread to the future, as it may exercise a most baneful influence on the peasantry and lower classes, who are exclusively to be found among the converts.

There stands on the old market place of Magdeburg the statue of Emperor Otto the Great, almost 1000 years old, beside which are the statues of his two wives. Remarkable for their great antiquity, and as they have withstood even the destruction of the city in 1631, they are undergoing a thorough renovation.

Robert Schumann, an eminent musical composer and pianist, recently died at Bonn, Germany, aged 46. Some of his symphonies and many of his songs are familiar to American audiences, and have created genuine admiration of Schumann's great merit as a composer. For the last two years of his life he was a confirmed lunatic.

Record of the Times.

Mr. McCormick's reaping machines have been very successful in France.

Abdul Medjid is the best ruler Turkey has had for many years.

Actors and dancers are famous for reaching extreme old age.

According to Webster, there are 100,000 words in the English language.

In Hardenburg, Germany, they used to choose the man with the longest beard, burgomaster.

Marshal Pelissier has been made a duke by Napoleon III.

When a lady intends to blow you up, ask her to commit her remarks to paper.

The new dome of the capitol at Washington will cost a million and a half.

The most modest thing in the world is a clock—it is always "running itself down."

The population of California is generally set at from 350,000 to 400,000 souls.

A man who recently jumped from a burning house put on a life preserver to break his fall!

There are in New Orleans twenty-eight hundred drinking houses to a population of 80,000.

There are over eighty brickyards in the single town of Haverstraw, on the Hudson.

The victor in an argument can afford to dispense with "the last word."

There are thirty newspapers in Cuba, but with the government mazzle on, they don't amount to much.

Congress has passed an appropriation of $88,000 for the Portsmouth (N. H.) custom-house and post-office.

The proprietor of a temperance nine-pin alley, in Charleston, offers "Harper's Illustrated Bible" as a prize for 300 pins! A new feature in nine-pins.

Longfellow, the poet, pays a tax of $1000. This is something for a poet; that class are generally thought to be rather innocent of any taxes except of the brain.

Sulphate of zinc can be purchased at any druggist's, in the form of salt, and a pound of it dissolved in two pails of warm water and thrown into an offensive cesspool will soon deodorise it.

A cannon ball, shot from a British ship during the Revolution, while bombarding Amboy, was recovered a few days since in tearing down a building, deeply imbedded in a piece of oak timber.

The last Parliamentary return shows that on the 31st of March last, the amount of unredeemed national debt of Great Britain was £775,312,94 ($3,876,563,470), and the annual charge for upon the nation near twenty-four millions sterling.

In San Francisco a manufactory of sugar has been established upon a large scale. The capacity of the works is said to be equal to refining 300 to 400 tons of sugar, and 20,000 gallons of syrup a month. Supplies of raw sugars are ported from Manilla and Batavia.

It is said that there is not an ounce of pure otto of rose sold in this country.

The art of photography is so advanced that books are illustrated by means of it.

Gutenberg and Faust printed the Bible with metal types in 1440.

A London paper says that bonnets are almost invisible to the naked eye.

It is said that the Turkish women will be allowed to go unveiled henceforth.

A gentleman should possess a man's courage and a woman's tenderness—says a lady.

Mrs. Dudley, of Albany, N. Y., has given in all $76,500 to the observatory that bears her name.

A Benedict says it's not half so hard to get married as to get furniture.

A house without a woman is like a world without a sky—dark and dreary.

The valuation of Scotland last year amounted to more than fifty-five millions dollars.

The criminals in the United States cost nineteen millions of dollars annually.

An uncut gem is of no use—ditto an uncultivated man or woman.

It is impossible to live with one in whose truthfulness we can't confide.

A servant lately delivered this message: "Master's compliments and he's dead, sir."

Bayard Taylor writes that Thackeray's daughters are charming, unaffected and original.

The Cincinnati Commercial says: "Within the past three weeks nine marriages have been solemnized on the Fifth Street ferry boat."

According to official data, the whole number of persons who have emigrated to the United States during the thirty-six years, previous to Dec. 31, 1855, have amounted to 4,482,837.

Supposing the sea to have a mean depth of 1000 feet, it has been calculated that the amount of common salt it would contain would be equal, in extent, to five times the mass of the Alps.

Whitefield preached in thirty-five years eighteen thousand sermons. He once put himself on what he called short allowance, namely, three sermons on the Sabbath and one only on every week day.

Our colored brethren are not afraid to be funny at their own expense. On one of their New York houses of worship they have judiciously emblazoned the peculiarly appropriate words of Scripture—"The people that sat in darkness saw a great light."

Augusta Maywood is the name of an American danceuse, now preparing herself for the stage, in Italy, who is described as possessing, in combination, "all the grace of Cerito, the finish of Rosati, and the force of a Hercules, with the pantomime genius of Ristori." She will soon visit London, to bid for fortune's favors.

The stimulus given to the India trade by the Russian war seems to have infused new energy in the British home government in aiding the development of the resources of the East.—The crops this year are said to be large, and the exports from Calcutta, Bombay, and other parts, will be enormously great.

Merry Making.

What is it that causes a cold, cures a cold, and pays the doctor? A draft.

We know a man, the tones of whose voice is so silvery that his words pass for shillings.

Why are kisses like the creation? Because they are made out of nothing, and are very good.

An indirect way of getting a glass of water at a watering-place is to call for a third cup of tea.

Why is the letter I in Cicero like Denmark? Because it's between two seas (C's).

Women dread a wit as they do a gun; they are always afraid lest it should go off and injure some one.

"What is the occasion of that bell ringing, Tom?" "Well, I presume it is occasioned by somebody at the end of the rope."

Why is a man who prefers his oysters on the half shell like a prima donna? Because both are fond of a fu-rror.

No proof of temperance—a man with his hat off, at midnight, explaining to a lamp-post the principles of his party.

The schoolmaster, who flogs the boy, feels it a great deal more than the boy he is flogging; at least the schoolmaster always says so!

Virtue is no security in this world. What can be more upright than pump logs and editors? Yet both are destined to be bored.

How can a man who has no wings, be said to be "winged" in an affair of honor? Because in fighting a duel he makes a goose of himself.

A Hibernian Senator, speaking of suicide, said, "The only way to stop it, is to make it a capital offence."

Ladies generally shop in couples. When a lady has any money to spend, she dearly loves taking a friend with her to see her spend it.

"You have only yourself to please," said a married friend to an old bachelor. "True," replied he, "but you cannot tell what a difficult task I find it."

A friend of ours on being told that, if he wanted good health, he must "forego cigars," answered that he "would rather go four cigars than forego one."

A witty editor, who has just failed, says he did it with all the honors of war, and retired from the field with colors flying—sheriff's flags fluttering from two windows and the door.

"Solomon, I fear you are forgetting me," said a bright-eyed girl to her lover, the other day. "Yes, Sue," said slow Sol, excusing himself, "I have been for getting you these two years."

An English journal lately contained the following announcement:—"To be sold, one hundred and thirty-one lawsuits, the property of an advocate retiring from business. N. B.—The clients are rich and obstinate."

A schoolmaster in Cornwall, advertising his establishment, says—"Every boarder must be supplied with a Bible and a prayer-book, a knife and fork, three towels, and a silver desert spoon; all of which, except the books become the proprietor's perquisite on the pupil's quitting school."

Among the advertisements in a late London paper, we read that "Two sisters want washing."

Why is a cowardly soldier like butter? Because he is sure to run when exposed to fire.

"I say, Tom, how is your wife?" "She aint no better, I thank you, doctor."

Compliments are only prismatic bubbles, blown with the aid of "soft soap."

When is a man shaved with a silver razor? When he cuts off his heirs with a shilling.

It has been remarked that any man can be an orator who possesses the two great requisites of brass and volubility.

A shop in this city announces:—"Tonic Ale. For invalids by the dozen, in quart or pint bottles!" These invalids must be very small.

A cockney made his appearance in Sand Lake last week. He is an amateur sportsman. The last seen of him he was gunning after mud-turtle.

When a lazy man says "I'll do it at my leisure," you may take it for granted he'll never do it at all.

A baby is a living I O U—a "little Bill," drawn upon manhood, that is only honored when it arrives at maturity.

Even a railway engine is not the toughest material in the world, for it has its "tender" part attached to it.

An illiterate person once sent a note to a wag-gish friend, requesting the loan of his noose paper, and received in return his friend's marriage certificate!

It is said that after the murder of Captain Cook, the cannibals at Hawaii reversed the old proverb, and now have it that "Too many Cooks don't spoil the broth."

In New Zealand, when the marriage ceremony takes place, it is a very old custom to knock the heads of the bride and bridegroom together previous to their union.

"I say, Bill, 'ave you seen Wotdycallum?" "Wot, do you mean Wots'isname?" "O, no, not 'im; that 'ere tother." "O, ah! I seed 'im fast enuff."

When you hear an old bachelor inveighing against the extravagance of women, infer that he has never calculated the hundreds of dollars he has spent for wine and cigars.

A doctor told his patient that he must give him an emetic. "It's no use," said the patient, "I have tried it twice before, and it would not stay on my stomach five minutes."

Dr. Quincy being asked why there were more women than men, replied—"It is in conformity with the arrangements of nature; we always see more of heaven than earth."

The King of Denmark is selling one of his colonies, a newspaper paragraph says, "for a mere song." We have made inquiries in the city, and have ascertained that the song alluded to is "I've no money."

A gentleman from the rural districts—after vainly endeavoring to solve the mystery of chafing dishes, said: "Look-a-here, waiter, bring me some oysters, but have 'em biled down stairs. I don't want none of them darned little cook stores."

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOL. IV.—No. 6.

BOSTON, DECEMBER, 1856.

WHOLE No. 24.

THE WILL.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"Come in, Miss Ellen,—come in, child, out of the storm. I'm right glad to see you, my dear, for I have my heart full of trouble."

"Why, what is the matter, dame, that you should allow anything to make you low-spirited?" And the visitor flung off her hood and cloak, and revealed the form and features of a beautiful girl of seventeen. Her long black curls were wet with the snow flakes, but hastily pushing them from her forehead, she shook the particles off which yet remained on her dress, and then taking the old lady's hands in her own, looked smilingly up in her eyes while she repeated her question.

"What is the matter, dame? What makes you look so sad? Here I have come all the way up the mountain to see how you were this stormy day; and instead of being delighted to see me, you look as melancholy as if you had not a friend in the world. Give me my cloak again; I am going right home."

"No, no, Miss Ellen dear, you are not going home, and you know I am always glad to see you. But I have got a sick gentleman here, and I am afraid I can't make him comfortable, and sometimes I think he will die, and I have not had a wink of sleep these three nights, and I feel quite downhearted."

"Quite a list of troubles, dame; but don't despair. You know I am an excellent nurse, and will help you take care of your 'sick gentleman,' if you like; but first tell me who he is?"

"Ah, that I don't know any more than yourself, Miss Ellen. He was on the mountain, and trying to get to the top of 'Owen's Cliff,' the loose stones gave way; he had a dreadful fall, and was bruised terribly with the earth and stuff that fell on him."

"I suppose he was searching for those curious stones the party made such a talk about last summer, dame. But he should not have ventured up there, poor old gentleman."

"Old! he is not old, Miss Ellen. He is a young man, with pretty black hair, and the handsomest eyes—"

"A young man! Dame, you must be mistaken. You don't mean to tell me that it is a young man?" And the speaker, in great agitation, stood before her companion, with pale cheek and quivering lips, while the old woman, frightened at the change in her looks, stammered:

"O, don't look so, Miss Ellen dear! You look just as if you were going to faint. What shall I get you? What will your aunt say if you get sick? O dear, O dear!" And in a perfect flutter of alarm, the easily excited dame ran about the little kitchen and clasped her hands in helpless fright.

"Dame! come and sit down here quietly by me." Ellen Thornton was quite calm now, though her cheek and lip were white, and her hands clasped tightly on her heart.

"Don't be frightened; you know I never get sick or faint, or scream, or any such nonsense; so sit down and tell me all you know about this stranger."

As all the dame knew had already been told, the conversation was soon at an end, and Ellen, with that calm, stern manner, so overpowering to her nervous companion, then said :

"Take me where I can see him. I think I know this gentleman ; and if I do, you must let me share your care and trouble with him."

"Do you know him, Miss Ellen?"

Dame Jones's whisper was a fond one, and the sick man raised his head and looked towards the half opened door where the two females were standing.

"Godfrey!"

The slight girlish figure crossed the room, and kneeling beside the low couch, bent over the feverish hands extended to meet her, and trembling in every nerve, poured forth a piteous confession.

"Hush! hush, darling! you must not blame yourself. It was impossible for you to know."

"But I tried to hate you, Godfrey; and O, I thought such wicked thoughts!—and you lying here so ill all the time!"

The poor girl moaned with remorseful sorrow; every nerve was quivering with mental agony, and yet not a tear came to relieve her.

"Ellen, I am very severely injured. You must not think on the past any more, but collect all your energies, and strive to assist me in this unforeseen difficulty. I thought to get better without a physician, but it is impossible. Even now I fear I have delayed too long. Send for one instantly; and while the messenger is away, give me that writing-case; a few lines I must write, let the consequences be what they may. And now, darling, kiss me once. In another hour I may not recognize you, for already I fear the fierce fever rushing through my brain; and even now, the events of the past few days are passing from my memory."

Poor Ellen Thornton! The touch of those burning lips was felt on her cheek for days, weeks, months—nay, when years had rolled round, long years of suffering and sorrow, of wretchedness and neglect, the recollection of that first kiss, of those fond love words, was sufficient to check the angry feelings rising in her heart, sufficient to calm the excited temper, to banish the whisperings of revenge.

Unweariedly she attended him in that long illness. What to her were cold and storm, the lonely mountain height, the snow-covered path, and the thousand dangers that beset her on every side? No pain, no weariness was felt, as toiling up the lonely way, she hastened to share Dame Jones's solitary watch. And the reward, what was it? Would you know? You shall hear.

After long weeks of suffering, the stranger recovered. He knew all that he owed to that confiding and innocent girl, whose heart he had won; and believing that he loved her, without one thought of the future, without once asking himself the question, "Is it right?" he married her. Yes, actually married her; but not under the proud name he owned, the name his wife ought to have borne. No, his pride would not allow him to do that; to introduce the uncultivated, passionate, beautiful girl to his patrician relatives, as his wife—never! But he married her, and for a few months they lived in a dream of bliss.

But soon came an imperative summons from his home—a summons he must obey. They parted, and never more on earth did Ellen see him she had so idolized. A few weeks of anxious expectation, followed by a few more of dreadful forebodings, and it was all over. There were no shrieks of agony, no tears, no outward signs, to tell of the broken heart; but Ellen Thornton never smiled again after reading that fatal letter. It was ever with her, ever before her eyes; and engraven into her very brain were the words, "You are not, you have never been, my wife. Before I ever saw you, another held that place; and though I loved you well, and even now think too often of you, I could not, if free, place you in the position my wife must occupy. Forget that you ever saw me; you have nothing to reproach yourself with and may yet be happy; but do not seek to find me—it would be worse than useless loss of time." Cold, cruel and selfish, his words quenched forever the joy of that poor girl.

Alone in her little cottage (for the aunt, who had taken her, a little orphan, was no more) she lived for five years after the birth of her child, and at her death, the boy—little Godfrey—became the adopted son of the good old minister, who had married his parents, and who never ceased to deplore the part he had taken in causing the misery of the once merry and beautiful Ellen Thornton.

When Godfrey became old enough to understand his position, his adopted father acquainted him with the events of his mother's life, and thenceforth arose in the boy's mind a burning desire to discover whose son he really was; but circumstances prevented his fulfilling his intention until the death of his old friend, which occurred when he was sixteen.

"I am bringing home quite an addition to our establishment, dear mother, in the person of a youth I picked up among the Welsh Mountains. I met him at the funeral of his friend and adopted father, and as the poor lad was utterly alone in the world, and moreover won my fancy by his exceeding good looks and winning ways, I offered him the situation of my secretary—I had to create the office, for his pride would have taken offence at being dependent—and he gladly accepted the same. To my sister he will be invaluable, as in him she will find a kindred spirit in the pursuits she loves—natural history and botany,—but his knowledge so far surpasses hers that I sometimes feel afraid she will be jealous of him. Joking apart, he is a very gentlemanly, well-informed boy, considering where he has been brought up, and needs but very little polishing to fit him for any society. Of course, after taking him under my protection, I shall put him in the way of ‘rising in the world;’ and who knows but my protegee may become quite a celebrated character some day?”

“Have you well considered the responsibility you have assumed, my dear Arthur, in taking this young man under your protection?” asked Mrs. O——, some days after reading the above; her son in the meantime having arrived at home with his handsome young secretary.

“O, you know I never consider much about anything, mother,” replied the young man, with a happy laugh. “I saw him, took a fancy to him, and determined to be his friend. To be able to gratify such fancies is one of the privileges of our station, dear mother.”

“And one I am well pleased to see you exercise, my dear boy—only do so with discretion. If you will allow me to advise you in this instance, I should say, give young Thornton an opportunity of completing his education; he will then be competent to take a secretaryship from another, should you no longer wish to retain him near yourself.”

“The very plan I had arranged. It shall be put into effect at once.”

And forthwith Ellen Thornton’s orphan was put under the care of a clergyman—who increased his small salary by preparing young men for college—and when pronounced “finished,” was sent to Cambridge, and a salary allowed him sufficient, with his handsome face and figure, and gentlemanly deportment, to prevent too close inquiries into his birth and parentage.

The question of “Who is he?” was generally answered by some such remark as, “A protegee of Arthur O——’s;—the son of some Welsh parson, or doctor, or something; but a con-founded handsome, stylish looking fellow, isn’t he?” A question no one could avoid answering in the affirmative; for, in addition to the aristocratic air he owed to his father, Godfrey possessed all his mother’s bright beauty; and the peculiar charm of his manner arose from its similarity to hers.

Ever an agreeable companion, his society was sought after by many of the young collegians, who, had they known his history, would have spurned him from their aristocratic presence. But Godfrey sought no one’s acquaintance; he had resolved to make the most of his advantages; time was very valuable to him now, and his very reserve and distance helped to make him thought of consequence by his companions.

“What do you intend doing with that Thornton, Arthur?” inquired Albert M—— of his cousin, as they sat in one of the spacious parlors of O—— House one day, some six months after Godfrey’s return from college.

“I have not quite decided yet; and, to tell the truth, I am so much attached to his society that I hate to think of parting with him at all. But why do you ask?”

“O, for no particular reason, save that I think the fellow puts on too many airs considering his position. I am astonished that you allow Caroline to be so much in his society, and I think he has a great deal of impudence to put himself forward as he does. Look at them now,” he continued, pointing to the distant conservatory, through the glass doors of which Godfrey and Caroline were seen busily examining some new and beautiful plants she had just received.

“Well, I see them; and what of it, Albert? Caroline loves her flowers, and is delighted to have a companion of the same taste; and Godfrey, in his gratitude for what we have done for him, seizes every opportunity of being of service to us. My mother would not allow them to be together if she thought there was any danger; but Caroline is only a child yet.”

“Well, if the fellow is so fond of flowers, you would have done better to have made him your gardener.”

“It was my pleasure to do just as I have done,” was the somewhat haughty reply; “and no one has the right to question me. The fact is, Albert, you have not forgiven poor Thornton for outdoing you at Cambridge; and considering your advantages, your spite is hardly worthy of you, my good cousin.”

A dark look of rage came over the countenance of the young man thus addressed. He clutched the arm of his chair violently, and turning to his cousin, exclaimed:

“I don’t pretend to disguise my feelings; I hate him, and have ever since the hour I first beheld him. It is all very well for you to choose your own company, but I think some respect ought to be shown to your relations and their feelings. Do you suppose that I, the son of Sir Geoffrey M——, wish to be continually brought in contact with a low-born adventurer like that?—or that I like to witness the familiarity that exists between him and the lady I have long looked on as my future bride?"

There was an instant's silence, and then a hasty step crossed the room, a heavy hand was laid on the speaker's arm, and a voice, calm and distinct, exclaimed:

"Silence, sir!—nor dare to apply terms of disgrace to one of whom you know nothing ill or evil. You are well aware that I am no adventurer, that in every way I have striven to repay the kindness of your cousin, that again and again I have been overruled by him in my determination to seek my way in the world, and that it was by his interference alone that I was prevented from leaving England more than once. You have dared to find fault with my acquaintance with my benefactor's sister; I did not heretofore know that you had a right to do so; knowing it now, I can only say—I am sorry for her sake."

"Villain! would you presume to address me so?"

Albert sprang up, and his cousin's sudden grasp of his arm alone prevented the intended blow. The entrance of Mrs. O—— and her daughter caused them all to draw back, and Godfrey left the room. That night he refused to admit even his friend Arthur. The following morning a servant delivered a letter at the bedside of the latter, and in it he learned that his protegee had left his protection forever.

Hastening to his room, Arthur found that he had indeed left them. His clothes and some few of his books were gone; but the valuables with which from time to time he had himself presented him, were in their usual places.

"Let every article remain as it is," was the young master's orders to the wondering domestics. "Mr. Thornton will soon come home again, and I wish his room to be undisturbed."

But days and weeks passed, and no tidings came from the absent one, and Arthur mourned sincerely for the loss of his friend.

"But, aunt, my hopes have been so long centered on this, I cannot give it up."

"I have told you all that has passed, Albert. Caroline refuses you, and I have no wish to control my child in such a case, nor should I have supposed you would wish it."

"It is only girlish nonsense, aunt. I am certain you could overcome her objections if you tried. You know how much my father wishes it; nothing but his ill health prevented his being here to-day."

"You must see Caroline yourself, then, if you do not think I am telling you the whole truth; but I warn you that you will hear some things that may not please you."

"Caroline."

The young girl started at the voice. She had been carefully cutting the withered leaves from a beautiful white moss rose, and the occupation had given rise to painful remembrances of the past. That white rose, her favorite flower, was Godfrey Thornton's gift, and she never looked on its delicate blossoms without thoughts of him. The interruption to her reverie was disagreeable—the intruder, even more so.

"Caroline, your mother has given me permission to seek you here. I need not tell you for what purpose."

Albert M——'s voice trembled slightly, in spite of his habitual assurance. He did not like the cold, contemptuous look with which his cousin was regarding him.

"And did not my mother acquaint you with my wishes on the subject?"

"She did; but I could not take such a message as decisive after all the hopes I have cherished—"

"You had no foundation for hopes, Albert; and the decision my mother acquainted you with is my final one."

"And what objection can you possibly have to me, Caroline?" he exclaimed, his anger breaking forth and his face flushing, as he moved towards her and attempted to take her hand. "But I see how it is; that beggarly adventurer is still in your thoughts, and the love I once thought I possessed is given to him; the heart I have so earnestly sought for is bestowed on him without being asked for."

With a cheek whiter than her snowy robe, and a proud gleam in the usually mild blue eyes, Caroline stood before her cousin, and even he, fierce and ill-tempered as he then was, quailed before that look and the bitter words that accompanied it.

"Sir Geoffrey is very low, sir; he took a fit soon after you went away yesterday, and the doctors say he cannot live through the night. You had better not go up too sudden, sir, they told me."

"Stand aside, old man!"

The words were accompanied by a violent push, and as Albert disappeared up the wide staircase, the old servant shook his clenched hand after him and uttered bitter words and threats of vengeance.

"I'll teach him some day to call me 'old man,' and push me aside with scorn. He little thinks that I know what I know." And, muttering, he went away, to meditate on plans far from friendly to the imprudent young man.

"Father! father! don't say that, unless you would drive me to distraction at once. It is not, cannot be true!"

"My son, as certainly as I am to leave this world, so certainly have I told you the truth. You are my son, but your mother was not my wife. Before I married her, another had stood beside me at the altar; and though I cruelly forsook her, made her believe that she was the deceived one, and have never since inquired about her fate, she was my wife, my legal wife, and her child, if living, is my heir."

There was a stifled groan, and overcome with his various passions, the young man rushed from the room.

It was not until some hours had elapsed that he had sufficiently overcome his emotion to stand once more at the bedside of the dying man. Conquering every outward display of feeling, he made the most minute inquiries into the past, and learned the whole sad story of poor Ellen Thornton's cruel deception and desertion.

Many times had Sir Geoffery heard the name of Arthur's protege, and yet the similarity had never occurred to him. As Ellen, alone, he remembered the beautiful girl he had betrayed, and her other name seldom or never came in his mind.

But with Albert it was different. The whole truth flashed on him at once. The names, the lonely Welsh hamlet, the likeness he well remembered to have existed between Godfrey and his own parent, all, all served to convince him that the hated intruder at his aunt's, and the long lost heir of his father, were one and the same.

The old man loved the son he had so long reared as his only child, and in his will he had well provided for his future. But he felt that he was dying, and to do justice to the long neglected offspring of his once loved Ellen was the one ought that engaged his mind. A will, in accordance with the extraordinary circumstances the case, had been made in Albert's absence, and entrusted to the care of the old and faithful servant, before mentioned, with strict injunctions to deliver it to the care of a certain lawyer, whose place of residence was too far distant to allow of his being summoned in time.

For many months this old servant had suspected his young master of being too attentive to his pretty grand-daughter, who resided in the neighboring village; and though his suspicions had not received complete confirmation, he had discovered enough to excite his anger, and induce him to drop hints to the young man relative to the same.

To one of Albert's disposition, this was sufficient to arouse his everlasting hatred. He had long pursued the girl, and the presumption of her careful relative excited him to the fiercest rage—rage, which had, however, to be hidden from the knowledge of his parent, in whose estimation old William was perfection itself, an opinion which manifested itself in the confidence he ever placed in his faithful retainer.

To overcome old William's conscientious scruples, and bribe him into giving up the will and keeping secret all he knew, was Albert's first determination, and he spent the interval between Sir Geoffery's death and funeral in fruitless endeavors to accomplish the same. As well might he have exercised his eloquence on the elements. The old man, true to his trust, scornfully rejected his glittering temptations, and ridiculed the idea of his being so lavish of what rightfully belonged to another.

One last endeavor Albert made, as useless as the others, and then he swore a solemn oath that the obstinate old man should never live to carry out the wishes of the dead. Suddenly changing his manner, he appeared to give consent to his departure, and urged the importance of haste, and the great saving of time it would be if William proceeded to the neighboring town over night.

A little suspicious that all was not right, but still far from imagining anything like the truth, the old man started on his journey and stopped at his daughter's home to spend the night. There were none to warn the faithful old servant of his danger—none to tell him that the murderer was on his track. He went to his chamber, deposited his precious charge safely beneath his pillow, laid down to slumber, and in the morning was found a disfigured corpse.

Taking advantage of the knowledge he possessed of the premises, Albert had effected an entrance, killed his enemy, and possessed himself of the fatal will. But alas for his wicked hopes, the unfortunate girl, whose destroyer he had been, at once saw the error she had committed, and filled with remorse for her conduct, and blaming herself for the death of her grandparent, she fled at once from her home, intending to seek out the gentleman for whom that will had been intended and confide to him the whole story.

The story of the murder excited but little interest out of the county in which it occurred. It was generally believed that old William had started with a considerable sum of money on his person; that a party of miserable, distressed miners from the neighboring collieries—who had for some time infested the country round, committing various depredations—must in some way have discovered this, and killed him for what they believed he possessed.

Some efforts were made to discover the perpetrators of the horrid deed, a reward was offered, and Albert made a great show of anxiety and grief on the subject; but as nothing was elicited, it gradually died away; the widowed daughter received all her father's effects, with a handsome addition from the heir, and he, on his part, flattered himself that no suspicion would ever reach him.

Of the unfortunate girl, whose disappearance none could account for, nothing was heard for several weeks; and even her mother at last yielded to the conviction that she must have made way with herself, although many suspected the poor creature to have been implicated in the murder, if not the sole doer of the deed. It had been part of old William's plan to tell his granddaughter the story of the will, hoping, by exposing Albert's conduct, to put her on her guard against him. To the mother, he made no mention of his business, and hence the apparent safety of the guilty young man.

But in spite of his seeming security, Albert felt far from safe or easy in the position he had assumed on the death of his father. Occupying a place he knew rightfully belonged to another; suffering all the terrors of a guilty conscience, and much distressed at the disappearance of his unfortunate victim, his state of mind was in no respect enviable. To make another effort to obtain his cousin Caroline's hand was a determination acted on without loss of time. Should the truth ever become known, and he be obliged to resign his possessions to the rightful heir, Caroline's fortune would be a handsome addition to his own; and the connection would be a desirable one, if only to secure Arthur's protection for his sister's husband, whom it was most probable he would befriend, even when found to be guilty of the blackest crime.

All these selfish considerations induced him to once more visit O—— House in the character of a suitor for the fair hand of the heiress; and as he did not hasten to unfold his purpose, but rather sought to interest his cousin in his recent afflictions by a studied show of melancholy, he seemed to have a fairer prospect than ever. Caroline's tender heart was melted with compassion at the visible change in his appearance—a change she attributed to grief for the loss of his parent,—and so kind and sisterly was her behaviour that he was at last emboldened once more to state his hopes.

It was in the midst of their conversation, and just as she had for the last time declared the utter hopelessness of his suit, that a letter was delivered to the young man. One hasty glance over it showed him the precipice on which he stood.

It was from his late father's friend, the lawyer, to whom the search for the missing son had been confided; and without scruple or hesitation, he avowed his knowledge of the whole transaction, his determination to see justice done, and his conviction of who the murderer was, as well as his intention of proving it.

To the guilty Albert, this letter sounded like a death-warrant. He instantly rushed from the presence of his cousin, procured one of Arthur's pistols, and when next seen was lying a disfigured corpse in a neighboring field.

"You do not seem half so much rejoiced as I had expected you would, Godfrey, under the circumstances," said Arthur O——, as the two sat in the rooms of the former at Paris.

"My joy is considerably dashed with sorrow, Arthur, and if you think for a moment you must see, not without reason. In the hour that I discover my long sought father, I also hear that he is no more; I come into possession of a splendid fortune, and I learn that it is bought at the expense of my only brother's life. One other question yet remains to be decided; should that be contrary to my wishes, my fortune is valueless. I shall entrust it to you—to whom I owe everything in this world—and fulfil my intention of travelling; an intention my poverty has hitherto rendered impossible of accomplishment."

"And that one 'undecided question,' Godfrey? Will you not give me a brother's privilege and tell me all your hopes and fears?"

"If favorable, that will give you a 'brother's privilege,' Arthur, and on that rests my every hope of happiness."

"Godfrey, I have long suspected it—you will succeed." And with a warm hand-clasp, the young man closed the conversation and left the apartment.

"Mama, do you not feel uneasy at Arthur's long absence? He went away so suddenly, too, and has never written yet."

"I received a letter from him this morning, dear. He will be with us to-night; and a gentleman accompanies him—a suitor for my dear child's hand."

Caroline O—— glanced at her black dress, and a visible shudder passed over her. The fearful shock of her cousin's death had occasioned a fit of sickness, from which she was only just recovering, and her pale cheek grew paler at the thought of the stranger and his errand.

"Mama, I cannot see this gentleman. Indeed, I am not fit to mix in society now. I shall never marry, I am certain I shall not; and Arthur should not bring a stranger here when he knows how ill I am."

"My dear Caroline, you will be allowed to follow your own inclination, as you have always done; but you must see him once, if only out of regard to Arthur's feelings."

"I may see him, mama; but I am firm in my determination never to marry. You do not wish me to leave you, my own mama?"

"A very wise resolution, my little sister; and I am glad my friend is here to learn his fate at once," said Arthur's cheerful voice; and turning, the young girl beheld her brother, and one she never hoped to meet again on earth.

"Godfrey!"

The voice was weak and faint, and she seemed on the point of falling from her seat. To spring forward and catch her in his arms, while Arthur beckoned his mother from the room, was the work of an instant; and then kneeling at her feet, he asked her to give him the love without which his path through life must be a dreary one.

It was not until after she had promised him he asked that Caroline learned the change which had taken place in Godfrey's fortunes. To her it made no difference; he was her Godfrey still. To him it was a most precious assurance, that for himself alone the gentle girl had loved him.

Six months after the restoration of the heir of M—— Manor, there was a happy wedding party gathered beneath the hospitable roof of O—— House. And if the bride did look somewhat pale, and glance timidly around her, as they stood before the altar of the old chapel, it was nothing more than a passing recollection of painful events. She felt the warm pressure of the hand that held her own; she looked in the handsome, beaming countenance of him who had just promised to love and cherish her through life, and with a smile and a tear at her superstitious terrors, she clung to his arm, and went forth safe under his fond protection.

Arthur, pitying his mother's loneliness, promised to provide her with a daughter to take the place of the one she had lost, and true to his word, a very few months saw a young mistress of O—— House. Since then there have been no complaints of the dulness of the old mansion. Arthur's merry, bright-eyed wife—Arthur's beautiful, spoiled children—and Arthur himself, afford plentiful occupation for the time and thoughts of the affectionate old lady.

It is quite an event when she leaves home to visit at M——, those lovely, gentle, little grandchildren, who remind her so strongly of their mother in her childhood.

BROTHER JONATHAN.

The origin of this term, as applied to the United States, is as follows: When General Washington, after being appointed Commander of the Army of the Revolutionary War, went to Massachusetts to organize it, he found a great want of ammunition and other means of defence; and on one occasion it seemed that no means could be devised for the necessary safety. Jonathan Trumbull, the elder, was then governor of the State of Connecticut; and the general, placing great reliance on his excellency's judgment, remarked, "We must consult Brother Jonathan on the subject." The general did so, and the governor was successful in supplying many of the wants of the army; and thenceforth, when difficulties arose, and the army was spread over the country, it became a by-pharse, "We must consult Brother Jonathan," and the name has now become a designation for the whole country, as John Bull has for England.—New York Atlas.

SMALL FARMS.

We desire to impress on the common-sense reasoning of every man, the great importance of having no more land in cultivation than can be well cultivated. By no means attempt to manage more than you can manage well. Be a farmer, not a mere scraper, lazily scratching up sufficient earth to destroy the face of the soil, and throw seed away, or you will always have to scratch hard for a living. But make your farm a source of pride, and it surely will become a source of profit. Make the object to be, not to have many, but rich acres.—Ploughman.

INGENIOUS PAINTER.

A famous artist made a painting in which all the different nations of the earth were represented in the peculiar dress of their country. Instead, however, of clothing the Frenchman, he drew him in his shirt, with a bundle of cloth under his arm. Being asked the reason, he replied: "The French dress themselves so many different ways, and change their fashions so often, that whatever dress I should put on him, in a short time he would not be known; having the stuff, he may cut it to his liking."—Tribune.

AT THE ALTAR.

BY BOLANTRÉ.

She stood there at the altar,
Bright gems were on her brow,
And in a voice of music
She breathed the nuptial vow;
But yet she did not love him
Who stood there by her side,
And 'twas with deep reluctance
She vowed to be his bride.

But friends are rich and powerful,
She doeth as they say;
And thinks, with heart nigh bursting,
Of one now far away.
For, O, how will he judge her,
When hears he she has wed?
That henceforth he must view her
As one unto him dead?

O, cruel thought and bitter!
The crystal tear-drops start,
And down her cheek they trickle,
From out her pent-up heart.
A tear unto his memory!
Her love is not yet dead,
Although she's now another's,
And to another wed.

LILLIE HOLBROOK.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"I WILL never marry a woman with red hair," said Aubrey Kinnard.

"Take care what you say, Aubrey," said his cousin, Margaret Ashton. "All these resolutions invariably end in doing the very thing protested against. I would not be afraid to stake a considerable sum, that you will marry a red-haired woman, after all."

"Not if she was as handsome as an angel, and as good as you are, Maggie!"

"Thank you, for writing me down good, instead of handsome, Aubrey—and there are not many ladies who would thank you for it either; so I suppose it is another proof of my goodness. But your compliment does not prove your assertion, and your assertion does not prove the fact; and my opinion is, that you will marry one whom I have in my mind now, although you have never seen her."

"And pray who may that be, Maggie?"

"My particular friend, Lillie Holbrook. She is coming to make me a visit, and I defy you to resist her, red-haired though she be."

"I defy her! Seriously, Mag, it is an objection I never could get over."

"Well, give me your word that you won't be engaged to any one till you have seen Lillie?"

"Very readily. I have no thoughts of giving up my freedom yet." And the good-natured, indolent fellow threw himself into a luxurious chair, and with his feet in another, he proceeded to smoke his fragrant Havana, in lazy forgetfulness of everything else.

"What do you live for, Aubrey?" asked his cousin, as she watched his placid countenance.

"To tease you, Maggie."

"Nay, you cannot do that, Aubrey, because I care so little for your talk. But I am really anxious about your state. Young, rich, not particularly good-looking! but passably so; with nothing to employ your time after two o'clock, and no incentive to active and healthful toil for the mind or body—at least no visible incentive—I am afraid you are passing away this season of youth almost too lavishly, and that by-and-by, when age comes, you will have no resources against it."

"What can I do, Maggie?"

"Read—for one thing. Those vile cigars stupify your brain, when you ought to be storing it with knowledge. You have talents, Aubrey, but you will not use them; and I believe the best wish for you from those who love you, would be that you should lose your property, and your present situation in the bank, and become dependent on your own invention for support."

"Thank you, dear! Your wish is very benevolent; but I cannot say that I respond to it."

"Very likely, and yet I believe your character would increase in value a thousand-fold. Life has been too easy to you, Aubrey. You have never known the 'uses of adversity'—your spirit needs uplifting, and it can never be uplifted, while these indulgences of life lie so thickly around you. You have never mastered a difficulty—never earned an enjoyment."

Margaret was right. Aubrey Kinnard needed discipline—the discipline of sorrow or of poverty, to bring out his interior resources. He had talents, but they lay dormant, because there was no outward necessity for their use. He had not genius—for that will always make itself known—but he really had talents, only that he did not see why he should trouble himself with application to any pursuit, when fortune had saved him the anxiety of providing for the future.

He had benevolence—that transient, sympathetic benevolence which cannot bear to look upon apparent suffering—but he had not that deep and wide-spread feeling which prompts to acts of self-sacrifice, and which seeks for objects on which to expend its energies. That was the benevolence which Margaret Ashton would have encouraged. Aubrey had seemed to her as a brother. His father's house had been her home from childhood, and as he had no sister, he came to think of Margaret in that light. She, too, was rich in her own right. She was richer, too, in a strong and active mind, a firm will, a steady, inflexible sense of right, and an active and self-denying benevolence.

Lillie Holbrook was her dearest friend, and she had often wished that Aubrey could know her. She was just such a woman as he ought to marry, and although averse to match-making in general, she determined in this particular case, to throw them if possible into each other's society.

Aubrey was out of town for a few days, and when he returned, it was to find Miss Holbrook fairly installed for a long visit. She was all, and more than all, that Margaret had so often painted to him, but alas! she had the obnoxious colored hair! True, it was long and soft and glossy, and hung in rich curls on her neck and shoulders, and in all other respects she was a lovely and attractive girl; but he never—no never, could get over that objection, he told Margaret. He begged her not to talk of him to her friend, for he could fulfil no hopes that she might raise.

"Aubrey! Lillie Holbrook would never marry a man who was so indolent and purposeless as yourself. She told me so herself."

"Then you have already talked me over. Was that kind or delicate, Maggie?"

"Don't be so hasty, Aubrey. You have never been mentioned in any way; but we often converse upon preferences, and the very character which you possess, was this morning unconsciously described by Lillie, and her opinion given."

Aubrey was piqued and fretful—and as it was a rare mood for him to be in, Margaret rather enjoyed it. She did not irritate him by words, but she looked all that she felt, and he saw that she was thinking of his life, so unworthy as he knew she thought it.

At that moment, it made him unjust to both Margaret and her friend; although he could not but acknowledge, when his temper cooled, that they were so different to the common class of young ladies. Those with whom he had been acquainted, had flattered, rather than found fault with him, and he found a pleasant variety, from the sweets with which he had been too often cloyed, in this independent lady who dared pick flaws in characters which no doubt, she compared to his. At any rate, it made him resolve to cultivate her acquaintance more fully. But how should he do it? Lolling in his cousin's room all the afternoon hours, while they sat at work, would not, it seemed, recommend him to those utilitarian ladies. What exploit should he attempt? He applied to Margaret, but she could not mark out any path for him. He must think for himself.

There was a long time, in which he forsook his usual seat in Margaret's room. Sayings that dropped from her, and harder still, from her friend, bore such a reproachful bearing upon the indolence and uselessness of his life, that he felt displeased and irritable.

"A good sign!" said Lillie. "Your cousin will be something yet! I knew there was good metal there, if you could but strike the right spot."

She had been talking to him of the grandeur of a life devoted to the interests of humanity, self-sacrificing, active, fearless of rebuke. She painted the glory of such a life, as compared with one given up to merely selfish enjoyment or inactive indolence. He applied all her sayings to himself, and was vexed with himself and with her, while he could not but acknowledge that he deserved it, when his life was so aimless. He could not but own that his chief purpose was to live for his own enjoyment—not mental enjoyment—but purely the enjoyment of the senses.

And now in his few and transient visits to his cousin's room, where the two sat in conclave, he laughingly told them, upon his faults, he began to feel that Lillie Holbrook was a woman whom a man might both love and reverence; love, for her beauty and genuine kindness of heart, and reverence for her noble independence of mere show and fashion.

"Is not Lillie's hair darker since she came here?" he asked Margaret, one morning, when, for a great wonder, he found his cousin alone.

"Much the same as usual, I think," said Margaret. "Quite red, isn't it? And what a pity it is, when she is so handsome otherwise."

"It does not strike me as being so very red, Maggie. At least it is not the color which I dislike so much. It seems to me that it is of that shade called amber by the poets."

"No, Aubrey, poor Lillie's hair is decidedly red, and she calls it so. She does not like it any better than you do—but she is too wise a girl to quarrel with nature about the shade of her hair."

It was all in vain. Aubrey grew deeper and deeper in love with Lillie, and one day, he made a desperate offer of his heart and hand, and was refused! Kindly and gently, it is true, but decidedly. And she was the only woman to whom he had spoken those words, and she, too, had the very obnoxious hair, and had refused him!

He was absent after this for some time. Even his father and mother did not know where he was gone, and Margaret was quite uneasy. Lillie never disclosed to her friend what had passed between them; nor did Margaret suspect, when he returned, haggard and miserable, that her friend was the cause.

Aubrey had other causes too, of trouble. A clerk in the bank with which he was connected, was suspected of wrong. Aubrey had not left town as they supposed, but was watching him, unsuspected, night and day, and yet the man escaped him. The embezzlement covered the whole amount of Aubrey's property; and when he arose the next morning, he was a beggar! Much of his father's property was in the same connection, and of his, barely enough was left to secure the old people against the chances of poverty. Fortunately, Margaret's fortune was invested elsewhere. Such was the news which he had to communicate; and he suffered severely in doing so.

The next morning the bank declared its failure. The embezzlement was only one of a series of enormous frauds, practised by this clerk, and an accomplice, in which they were successful enough to escape detection, until it was too late.

"Where are you going, Aubrey?" said Margaret, one morning, a week after this affair, as she saw him come down stairs with his cloak on his arm and his valise in hand.

"I sail in the next steamer to California, cousin. I'm going to New York this afternoon."

"And never told me until now, Aubrey! I would not have thought it of you."

"I could not bear to talk about my resolution, Margaret, especially as it was the first one that I ever made in regard to business. I have not yet told my mother."

"Poor auntie! how will she bear it?"

"Poorly enough, at first, but she will get reconciled at last. It was no use to prolong her suffering, so I am going away, and shall then write her just before I sail. I must not have her tears shake my purpose, as I fear they will, if I tell her now."

"And is this to be our good-by?" said Margaret, as her cousin pressed her hand. "And do you say nothing to Lillie?"

"Where is she?"

"In the drawing room, alone."

Aubrey made a movement forward as if he would have gone in, but he came back to Margaret, and charged her with a simple farewell. "I shall return in a year, Maggie. Take good care of my mother, and write me every mail."

He was gone before she had recovered her surprise.

How lonely seemed the house without Aubrey! Lillie, too, was about departing, and urged Margaret to accompany her; but she would not leave Mrs. Kinnard alone. Margaret was ever self-sacrificing, and she remembered Aubrey's words. So she staid, and Lillie departed, with the promise of another visit soon.

Aubrey's first letter was calm and composed. He was looking round for something to retrieve his fallen fortunes. The next told of his success; and still another of discouragement. He had been very ill, but had now recovered.

Margaret noticed that ever after he had written one of despondency, he followed it up quickly with one of strong and hopeful cheer. There was an evident growth in his mind, which she rejoiced to think was genuine and progressive. Lillie came again, and the letters were duly shown to her. She read them quietly, without comment.

"You seem quite indifferent about Aubrey, Lillie," said Margaret. "I hoped you would be more interested." Lillie colored violently.

"Why, Lillie! there is some mystery here, with which I am not to be made acquainted, it seems."

"No mystery at all, Margaret. Aubrey wanted to marry me, when he was rich and prosperous, and indolent. I refused that Aubrey—but here is another Aubrey, who writes these letters, and who seems to be altogether of a different character. He is poor and struggling, it seems, for a living—but I tell you, Margaret, this Aubrey would have a different answer from me now."

Margaret sat speechless with wonder. She had not dreamed of it before. She sat so long without speaking or raising her eyes, that Lillie began to think that she was offended, but her bright and satisfied look, when she did look up, was sufficient.

"Just what I always wished, Lillie, and yet I am vexed that neither of you told me before."

"What was the use, when nothing was to come of it, Maggie? Of course, Aubrey would not trumpet his own refusal, and you would hardly expect me to boast of his offer."

"Right, Lillie, I see I was foolish to expect it;" but still Margaret puzzled her brain about Aubrey's offering himself to Lillie. Had he not always disdained red hair, and Lillie's was indisputably red.

Another letter from Aubrey! and Lillie was as anxious to hear it as Maggie was to read it.

"Where do you think I am at this moment, Cousin Margaret? At the mines, where for the last fortnight, I have been hard at work, digging.

I am writing you on the leaf of a book, which I brought with me, to register my days' work. I have been successful beyond my most sanguine hopes. I work hard, sleep hard, and our eating is of the very hardest description; yet I am perfectly well, and you would be astonished to see me. I have expanded from a small man to a large one. Bone and sinew seem to have enlarged, and I breathe so easy here! Not a single cigar has profaned the lips which you kissed at parting. Maggie, I did not tell you that I offered myself to your friend, and that she refused me with a sublime indifference that was anything but complimentary. Well—I did! notwithstanding that I did not like her hair! But she is a noble girl—and when I return—who knows if I may not meet with better success with her. I know that she despised me for my indolent life. I wish she was here now to admire me, as I take the lead in our hard enterprise here.

"I wear a hunting-shirt and trowsers of a coarse, strong material; a leathern belt, in which is my knife. With this I cut all my food, holding bread, meat, etc., in my left hand. Boots of soles two inches thick, or nearly that, adorn my lower limbs, and a hat of almost fabulous size covers my head. Nothing superfluous—no cravat, suspender, vest, coat or stockings fetter me. I have a blanket, which I throw down on the grass, sometimes on a rock, and sleep so soundly! Life is worth something here. Sometimes, I think I shall never go back—but I yearn for home and friends—for Cousin Maggie, dear girl! and for Lillie—she shall love me when I go home. I am worthy of her now. I feel that I am worthy now of the love of woman. No wonder that she did not love such an effeminate, selfish fellow as I have been. You see now, Maggie, I am carrying out what you said of me. You encouraged me, when you said that I had talents. I am thankful for all the help you have been to me. If women only knew their influence, and would direct it aright, we men would be all the better. Now for hard work a few months longer, and then—for Lillie!"

"You may write him all that I said to you about him, Margaret, if you wish. I have no objection."

And Margaret wrote; and soon Lillie received a letter from him, and with it came a picture, taken in his miner's dress; and which, had they not known that it was taken for Aubrey, would have been perfectly undistinguishable. Were that flowing hair—that immense beard, and those broad shoulders, the adjuncts of the small, delicate-looking youth, whose white hand rivalled a lady's, and who never lifted any burden heavier than his cloak, before he went away?

Do you want to know if Aubrey returned and married Lillie? Of course he did. Did you ever know any one to have a fixed purpose in anything and not carry it out? And Margaret—she is not married yet, for how could the two families get along without her? She lives to counsel, to aid and support their courage and strength in the great battle of life. She still loves an arch jest at Aubrey about red hair; but he declares that Lillie's is not red, and that her jests fall powerless. Still, she can well perceive that he is daily examining that of his little Margaret, to see if it will be darker than her mother's.

"I hope it will, Aubrey," Margaret says maliciously—"for it is an objection you never could get over," you know."

CONCERN FOR OTHERS.

During a heavy storm off the coast of Spain, a dismayed merchantman was observed by a British frigate drifting before the gale. Every eye and glass were on her, and a canvass shelter on a deck almost level with the sea suggested the idea that there yet might be life on board. With all his faults, no man is more alive to humanity than the rough and hardy mariner; and so the order instantly sounds to put the ship about, and presently a boat puts off with instructions to bear down upon the wreck. Away after that drifting hulk go these gallant men through the swell of a roaring sea; they reach it; they shout; and now a strange object rolls out of that canvass screen against the lee shroud of a broken mast. Hauled into the boat it proves to be the trunk of a man, bent head and knees together, and so dried and shrivelled as to be hardly felt within the ample clothes, and so light that a mere boy lifted it on board. It is laid on the deck; in horror and pity the crew gather round it; it shows signs of life; they draw nearer; it moves, and then mutters—mutters in a deep, sepulchral voice, "There is another man." Saved himself, the first use the saved one made of speech was to seek to save another. O, learn that blessed lesson. Be daily practising it. And so long as in our homes, among our friends, in this wreck of a world which is drifting down to ruin, there lies an unconverted one, there is "another man;" let us go to that man, and plead for Christ; go to Christ and plead for that man, the cry, "Lord save me, I perish!" changed to one as welcome to the Saviour's ear, "Lord, save them, they perish!" —Dr. Guthrie.

We are apt to mistake our vocation in looking out of the way for occasions to exercise great and rare virtues, and by stepping over ordinary ones which lie directly in the road before us. When we read, we fancy we could be martyrs; when we come to act, we find we cannot bear even a provoking word.

SEVENTEEN.

A Birthday Melody for "HATTIE HAYDEN."

BY WILLIAM EMERSON.

Seventeen!

Witching time for merry maiden,
As she wanders o'er life's green,
With the flowers of pleasure laden.

Seventeen!

Spring-time this, of girlish splendor;
Hope of it alone is queen,
With but fancy to defend her.

Seventeen!

Angels, guard her in her beauty!
Let your white wings intervene,
Should her young heart stray from duty.

Seventeen!

This of life the vernal season,
When the trusting heart will lean
More to fancy—less to reason.

Seventeen!

When the young heart has some idol,
And the hopes of life are seen
Running to some sweet-toned idyl.

Seventeen!

Hattie's years thus far have written
Gladness on a brow serene,
And a heart by woe unsmitten.

Seventeen!

And we wish her in her beauty
Of some brave heart to be queen,
With true love the line of duty.

THE DRUNKARD'S WIFE:

—OR,—

POISONING A HUSBAND!

BY EMMA CARRA.

"If you ever take another glass of brandy in this house, Nelson," said his wife, "believe me, it shall contain poison; for I have lived a drunkard's wife long enough, and I care not how quick the world is rid of me."

"Not if they despatch you from a platform with a rope, Kitty?"

"No, not if they despatch me from a platform with a rope; for I repeat with emphasis, I am tired of being a drunkard's wife. I cannot walk the streets but there seems to be a mark set upon me more fatal than the one God caused to afflict Cain. I hear it whispered from almost every corner, 'there goes a drunkard's wife!' and then our children are pointed at as the children of a sot! Let me try as hard as I may to keep them clothed and sent regularly to school, they meet with nothing but jeers and scoffs; while I, for the last ten years, have been a victim to your brutal appetite. So now I warn you in season that I will endure it no longer. If you place another bottle of brandy in that closet, and afterwards attempt to drink of it, you shall die! for I am desperate, nor care how soon the scenes of life close, if there is to be no end to your bestial habits."

And the wife's cheek was almost ghastly pale, and there was an unnatural expression in her eye which made her husband quail beneath her wild glance; but he tried to laugh—for he was sober now, and he wished to make his home pleasant until it suited his purpose to go out again and spend what rightly belonged to his family, to enrich the rum-seller. The wife had known him too long to indulge the delusive hope that kindness would bring about his reform; so, with a determined air, she made the threat that caused her husband to quail, though he tried to appear jovial and unconcerned. But the wife had a piercing eye, and with one keen glance she read his thoughts; but she did not falter or swerve from what she had spoken.

"O, Kitty, you wouldn't poison your husband, would you?" continued he, with a shade of anxiety on his face.

"Ask me no more questions," said the wife, with no smile on her lips; "you have heard what I said and now wait to see the issue."

"O come, Kitty—don't be so hard with me; you know, after all, I am the best friend you have, and that I love you and the children."

"Yes, but you love the bottle better than either, Nelson, and I have borne with meekness too many hard words from you—ay, even blows in your heats of intoxication, to expect now that I shall ever have a pleasant home again. When you are sober for a few hours, as you are now, your intellect is covered with such a mist that you are the Nelson Brewer that I married years ago no longer; so I cannot transfer to you the love which I bore him when the flush of youth was on my cheek, for you are a drunkard, and do not merit the love of a wife and children. When you lifted the cup so often to your lips, his spirit left your bloated body, and since that time my life has been worse than widowhood, though for my children's sake, and that they might have bread—though at times scantily fed—I have remained in your miserable home, and sometimes, when in a hopeful mood, I have thought perchance you might reform; but I have given it all up now! Hope has fled, and I see nought but the alms-house, and a drunkard's grave in the future."

Mr. Brewer made no further remarks. He sat in silence a little while, looking out into the narrow court, seeing his pale, meagre children playing with the children of the neighborhood—as miserable as themselves—and a sigh half escaped him; but he tried to smother it, and in a few moments inquired of his wife if she would soon have supper ready.

"There is not an ounce of food in the house," said the wife, with a mournful air.

"Well, it sha'n't be so long, Kitty," returned the husband, pleasantly. And as he arose and went out, he stopped on his way and encircled his wife's neck with his arm, and playfully gave her a kiss.

The wife for the moment forgot her serious mood, but ere she could give a response, he darted through the outer door and was gone. With a heavy sigh, she resumed her needle and listened to the voices of the children as they came in at the open window; nor did she expect to see her husband again till he came reeling in, as usual, at a late hour of the night. But scarcely half an hour passed ere she heard his footsteps in the entry, and in another moment he entered, bearing in his hands sufficient food, when cooked, to provide a comfortable supper. Mrs. Brewer did not utter any exclamation of joy at what she saw; she only arose quickly, put away her sewing, and went about preparing the meal. And when it was ready, it was eaten in silence by the parents; but the children could not restrain their joy, nor did their mother chide them for their manifestations of delight as their father reached them cake after cake, and served them liberally.

"Kiss me, Kitty," said the husband, pleasantly, as he arose from the table and passing around to where she was sitting, presented his cheek near her lips.

The wife was silent for a moment, and there seemed to be a struggle going on in her bosom, for a tear was in her eye and a changing expression on her face; but in an instant more, they passed away, and looking sternly into her husband's face, she said:

"No, Nelson, I will never kiss a drunkard's cheek again."

"I am not drunk now, Kitty."

"Well, keep sober long enough to give me confidence that you will reform permanently, and then perhaps I may feel some of the tenderness for you I felt in other days, but not now should I wish to bestow a caress on you." And Mrs. Brewer pushed her chair from the table, while her husband turned away and went out.

"Don't be cross to father," said the eldest born, a beautiful child of twelve years, "for he has not been drinking to-day. And see what a nice supper he bought for us! So speak pleasant to him, and maybe he wont drink any more."

The mother drew her child nearer, and lifting the heavy chestnut curls that clustered around her neck and occasionally shaded her face, whispered in her ear something that pleased the child; and she broke out into a hearty laugh, which brought others of the group to their side with loud protestations that they, too, must have whispered in their ears that which made their sister Mary laugh. So Mrs. Brewer again pressed her lips to listening ears, but her words brought no merriment, although they seemed to satisfy the children.

Mrs. Brewer now resumed her needle, for it was by her industry and superior skill with it that her children were kept in as comfortable a condition as they were, while attending school, as her husband had long since lost all pride in the appearance of his family. The little Mary now cleared the table, and placed the coarse, scant furniture in order around the room, and then she, too, took her needle and seated herself beside her mother, and with an expression half merry and half in fear, said:

"And do you really intend to do so, mother?"

"I do, child; but hush! you must not speak so loud, for your brothers and sisters might hear, and they are not old enough yet to trust with important secrets."

Mary drew nearer her mother's side, and together they talked and sewed—the latter on garments for the family, and the other toiled on cheap slop work that she might obtain a pair of shop-worn shoes for the next Sabbath's wear, at an exorbitant price, now lying on the shopman's shelves.

And then when the sun withdrew for the night, and an artificial light was needed, the drunkard's children sought their humble beds, while the wife and mother waited at the window in darkness to listen for the coming of him she wished, yet dreaded, to see; for she knew not whether his footsteps would be steady. She heard the city clock strike nine, ten, and then eleven, and her heart grew faint, for every moment seemed to bring the time nearer when she would see her husband reeling in, and hear the fearful oaths that would come from his lips, and in imagination she felt his heavy hand fall with ponderous weight on her defenceless shoulders—heard the children, as in times gone by, when awakened at midnight, shrieking with fear, and then pass the night in sleepless misery. And now distant footsteps echoed up the street and neared the door, and the latch was lifted. It was he! Nelson Brewer stood within his little kitchen and with kind words inquired of his wife why she sat so late and waited.

"That I might know if the bottle had been filled," answered the wife with firmness.

"And do you indeed, Kitty, mean to put poison in that bottle if I bring it home filled?"

"I do, Nelson;" and the same look of determination accompanied her words.

"Well," said the husband, "there it is empty;" and he drew from his outside pocket a large black bottle and turned the bottom upward. "But I can get drink and will; so you might as well be peaceable and let me bring it home and drink it, or I shall reel through the streets after I have drank it elsewhere."

"No matter," said the wife, sternly, "you cannot always evade me, and when you feel the death pangs shooting through your veins, you will remember my words." And she arose and went to her room.

Mr. Brewer took the seat his wife left at the window, and with the cool night breeze blowing on his heated brow, his mind went back to former years when she first became the sharer of his home—how beautiful she looked when he brought her from the homestead away up among the trees and flowers, and what a happy prospect was his the first year or two of his married life—for his business was prosperous and his Kitty proved to be all that he thought she was, faithful, loving and prudent. But temptation came, and he had yielded in spite of the tears and entreaties of her he had promised to love, cherish and protect—notwithstanding that the little flock which increased around him needed his active exertions to make them what society required; and he contrasted those first years of manhood with the last few of his life. What changes seemed to have been wrought in everything!—in his wife's love and in people's respect towards him—and he began to believe now, what had been hinted to him by a neighbor, that his wife was growing insane, for she seemed so strange—so different from her former self, that he felt frightened at her threat, and felt, too, that her determined manner was proof sufficient that she meant what she said. So as the drunkard sat and thought, ill's seemed to thicken, in his imagination at least, till with a troubled brow he arose, closed the window, and sought his pillow.

Mrs. Brewer was sleeping, and the husband tried to sleep too; but he could not, for he remembered even in his dreams the fearful threat of poisoning made by his wife, and he saw over again with mental exaggeration her wild expression and pale cheeks as she spoke, and he resolved that he would drink no more, but try to soothe her mind and restore it to its former state.

And the next day came and Mr. Brewer was sober, and the empty bottle stood in the cupboard untouched. A week went by and then a month or more, and still Mr. Brewer shunned his former haunts and went daily to his shop, and now his wife began to have hope that the fetters that once bound her husband were broken, and there would be no more misery in their home; so the old smile of other days came back again, and when he playfully caressed her, she did not turn coldly away, but spoke words of encouragement even stronger than she felt, and pictured happy days in the future. Her manner pleased her husband, for it rid him of his care for her intellect; but with ease of mind came longing after old companions, and once more he fell.

The contrast to the wife was dreadful, as he again reeled into his home, but there was no renewal of the former conversation about poisoning. And thus several weeks went by, when Mr. Brewer, forgetting his wife's threat and his former fears, staggered into his miserable home with a well-filled bottle secreted in his pocket. Going slyly to the closet, he pushed it far back into the corner of a shelf, and then crept along to his room and laid his head on his pillow to take a drunkard's troubled sleep. Though Mrs. Brewer did not apparently look up from her work, she noticed every movement of her husband. But she made no remark; and when he was gone, she told Mary to put the younger children to bed, for she had business out. Then wrapping a shawl around her shoulders, she sought the street.

The children were soundly sleeping when Mrs. Brewer returned. Even Mary, who was left as housekeeper, had leaned her head back in the rocking-chair and closed her eyes, and when her mother awoke her, she sprang suddenly up, and with a wild expression inquired if she had been to get the poison.

"Go to bed, child," said the mother, "for it is late." And Mary, with a bewildered air, obeyed.

When Mary had retired, her mother took from her pocket a folded paper, and taking the bottle from the shelf, poured the contents of the paper—a powder—into the liquid within, and replaced it in the corner. The next morning she aroused the children early, and after due preparation told them to go to the Common and play till school-time, and then from there go to the schoolhouse.

Mr. Brewer's potations seemed to have been deeper than usual the previous night, for he did not waken from his lethargic sleep until after the school-bell sounded, when with a fevered and misty brain he crawled from his bed and half staggered into his comfortless kitchen. There was no one present; so going to the cupboard, he espied, standing as he had left it, the dark bottle in the corner apparently untouched. His burning thirst was too intense now to remember anything but that the means to gratify his appetite was before him; he did not even notice the sediment in the bottom, nor the peculiar taste that lingered in his mouth after the liquid was swallowed. And now that thirst was quenched, he again with unsteady step sought the old-fashioned bed-room back of the kitchen, and when he had once more pressed his pillow, he tried to sleep; but a peculiar sensation stole gently, at first, through his veins, that kept him wakeful, and then it gradually increased until pains began to shoot through his frame. The threat of Mrs. Brewer was uttered so long ago, and in her frenzied hours, that the husband had ceased to think of it; but now, as his pains increased and he could not account for them, the previous threat shot through his mind, and with a loud groan, he tried to raise himself from the bed; but his head was dizzy, and he fell heavily back, loudly calling on the name of his wife.

In an instant, the door that led from the kitchen was thrown furiously open, and Mrs. Brewer, with blanched cheeks and dishevelled hair, entered.

"Did you call me, Nelson?" said the wife.

"I did call you," replied he, slowly. "O, Kitty! what have you done?"

"What I said I would do—and now you must die! Ha, ha, ha! You have cursed the earth long enough."

Large drops of cold perspiration stood on the invalid's face, and his features were so distorted that none could have recognized in him the inebriate of yesterday, for the pallor of death was on his brow, and every limb was rigid. But Mrs. Brewer seemed to observe it all with joy, and gave vent to her feelings in a wild, idiotic laugh, while the husband, with failing strength, begged humbly, prayerfully, that she would hastily procure him an antidote for the poison, and he called on Him who alone has power to stay death to witness that he would never, never touch again that which would intoxicate.

"I believe you not," said the wife, "for you have promised me too often. I could save you even now, if I would, for I have an antidote; but I will not—you shall die!"

"Then I will save myself," half shrieked the husband, as with a convulsive movement he threw himself from the bed and tried to gain the outer door. But his wife sprang between him and it, and turning the key, she withdrew it and threw it out of a back window into the garden beyond. "Then I will leap from the window," said he, his voice growing fainter and fainter at every moment.

"Never!" shouted the wife, in a demoniac state; and she drew from beneath the small shawl that was thrown around her shoulders a pistol, and aimed it at his breast. "Dare take another step towards that window and I fire!" said she, assuming a determined attitude.

Mr. Brewer was overpowered! He felt that he had not courage to battle with death and a maniac; so sinking upon his knees, while his body was convulsed with pain, he offered up a prayer sincere and heartfelt that if he could but be once more restored to health no intoxicating drink should ever wet his lips again.

"If I could believe you!" said the wife, more calmly looking on.

"You may—you may!" he returned, almost gasping.

"Swear it again and again and kiss this book," continued the wife, "and then if I believe you I will save you; but if not, you have but a few moments more to live."

The husband grasped the worn Bible, and again and again repeated the oath, then sealed it with a kiss, and fell backward exhausted, fainting.

Mrs. Brewer stepped to the little closet and laid by the pistol; then returning, she raised his head from the floor and placed it on a pillow, and taking from her bosom a paper, she mixed the contents with water and held it to her husband's lips. With difficulty it was swallowed, and in a few moments after, Mr. Brewer commenced vomiting, and then his pains grew less.

Mrs. Brewer did not nurse her husband with tender care, but much the same as a maniac would nurse some favorite pet—anxious at times and then neglectful. But it was several weeks ere he ventured to go out from his home, for his wife acted so strangely that he feared she would do injury to herself or children—and well he knew if she had been sane, she would not have tried to poison him, even though he had been more intemperate than he was.

Mr. Brewer did not like to expose what his wife had done, nor did he allude to it even to her, for he felt that he was the cause of her mental derangement. But when, after his recovery, she proposed that they should move into another neighborhood where he would not meet with so many of his old associates, he readily agreed to it, and from this time there was a gradual change working in Mr. Brewer's home. The black bottle was broken, the old furniture was cast off for some of better quality, the children went better clad to school, and little Mary no longer sewed on slop-work, that she might purchase shoes for the Sabbath. The wife's mind grew more calm and peaceful now, though she never alluded to the past; and so years rolled by, and the husband still kept the oath he took when he thought death so near him.

His sons and daughters had now attained to the stature of men and women, amid peace and plenty, and though time had added to the father's age, one would have thought him younger now than when he took the oath. And so had time dealt gently with the mother, for bloom still lingered on her cheek, and a happy smile rested permanently on her face.

One evening a dark-haired youth—the accepted lover of Mary—had closed the outer door and left the eldest daughter and her mother alone, seated beside the winter's grate.

"Mother," said Mary, "do you not remember, many years ago, when we were very poor and father was intemperate, what you whispered in my ear one evening?"

"I do, Mary."

"Well, I have often thought it very strange that you would never allow me to allude to it afterwards, but I knew something unusual took place about that time, for one day when I came from school, I found father very sick, and you would not permit us to ask him any questions. But I recollect well that from that time he never drank again, and we were better off. Say, mother, did you attempt to poison?"

The mother sat silent for a moment, and then looking up with a smile, she answered:

"No, Mary, I never did; but he thought I did, and I have never undeceived him. It was a desperate game I played—one in which I knew if I were successful, I should never regret it, and if I were not, I could not be more miserable than I was as I saw his intemperate habits increasing."

"And will you tell me all the particulars?"

"Yes, child." And Mrs. Brewer looked cautiously around the room to make sure they were alone—and when she became satisfied they were, she commenced. "When your father first became intemperate, it grieved me to the heart—and I tried to reason with him and convince him how wretched would be our lot, if he did not desist. But he paid but little attention to me, except for the moment, and then sought his old companions again. Then I begged him with tears to shun intoxication—but all to no purpose. He would make me fair promises only to break them, and thus year after year wore on until I resolved to try another plan, and this I told to a neighbor whom I could trust, and to our family physician, who knew my trials and felt great sympathy for me. It was that before your father I should appear slightly insane, and then at a given time should threaten to poison him. I knew your father always had great dread of a maniac, and well he knew he had given me trouble enough to make me insane; so I acted well my part, for I was always called a good mimic, and now I had too much at stake not to do my best. You heard me make the threat, but I knew I could trust you; so I whispered in your ear it was all pretence. But still you feared, and I did not like to talk about it afterwards, for that morning's scene did well-nigh drive me mad, and nothing but the greatest firmness preserved me. Well, Dr. Selby prepared—I could not say what—but it had the desired effect, and I knew if he died it would be by fright alone, and that I had an antidote for his pains when I saw fit to give it."

"And would you indeed have shot my father?" inquired Mary, trembling.

Mrs. Brewer could not refrain from smiling.

"I guess not, Mary, as the pistol had no lock on it, or I should have been afraid to handle it. It was an old one I found in my neighbor's attic that morning, and I hardly know what prompted me to take it. But it answered a very good purpose, as he was too frightened to know a pistol from a cane."

"And when that scene was over, did you recover your mental faculties all at once?"

"Not before him, child, but gradually; and dreadful as seems that time to me when I look back, I cannot even now regret it, for we have all lived happily since. But I think it is not best to tell your father even now, for he might think hard of me for the stratagem I employed, but I meant it only for the good of all."

"O!" exclaimed Mary; and her mother, on looking up, saw a pair of dark, laughing eyes peering through the crevice of the door, and then her husband entered, and placing his arm around the neck of his wife, said pleasantly:

"I have heard all about it now, and the mystery is all cleared up, for I have sometimes had doubts about your ever really trying to poison me. But that pistol! Ha, ha, ha! Well, I believed it all then, and now I am very glad I did, for it worked a reform in me that has made my life happy since, and which will continue while God gives me strength to keep my oath."

SAYING, ALL IS OVER NOW.

BY WILLIE E. FABOR.

The regal summer's host of flowers
Were whispering to the wind,
And sombre shadows marked the hours
For lighter hues designed;
With meek hands folded o'er their bloom,
They to the cool breeze bow,
And, as if conscious of their doom,
Say, all is over now!

We sported through the sunny hours
In robes of gaudy hue;
We decked the green embosomed bowers,
Where maidens came to woo;
We lingered on the sunny plain,
We crowned the hillock's brow—
The valley held its floral train,
But all is over now.

When Summer drooped her head and died,
She left her children lone;
And Autumn comes, with steps of pride,
To take her vacant throne.
We fold our robes—we hide our bloom,
And to the mandate bow;
The frost king reads our final doom,
And all is over now.

BERTHA ALTON'S COUNTRY LOVER.

BY ANNIE CLAIR.

"It is not right, Bertha, you know it is not, to treat Harry Weston in this heartless manner."

"In what have I offended, gentle cousin?"

"You promised to go with Harry to the picnic to-morrow afternoon, and not five minutes since, I heard you make an engagement with that insufferable coxcomb, Fred Wilson, for the same hour we were to start for the grove."

"And is that all, dear Grace?" cried Bertha Alton, with a wild, ringing laugh; "but how can one expect you to understand such things, when you have spent all your life in the rural districts, away from civilization?"

"But I think you ought to have kept your engagement with Harry; for he is very sensitive, and I think he has met with but little of kindness. He has been left an orphan since he was an infant, and it is said Mr. Stanley has not treated him well. Come, send an excuse to Wilson, that you had made a previous engagement."

"I shall do no such thing; but you may tell Harry that I had forgotten I had made an engagement with Wilson. I shall not reject the attentions of such an accomplished gentleman as Wilson, for those of a country farmer. I relinquish all claims in that direction to your ladyship, and hope you will have a pleasant time at your excursion."

"But it will not be true, Bertha, that you had made a previous engagement with Wilson; therefore I shall not tell Harry so. I shall give him the true reason, or none."

"Well, please yourself, then, it does not matter much. I only flirted with Harry because he seemed to be the reigning favorite; but since Wilson's arrival the wind is in another quarter."

"I hope you will not suffer for this heartlessness, Bertha; you surely would not think of marrying Wilson!"

"Marrying Wilson! Who but you would ever think of such a thing? Still, I don't know, if he has a plenty of that 'root of all evil.' I have not ascertained yet how that is; but I tell you, Grace, I must be mistress of a splendid establishment; I must have the gay and fashionable world worshipping at my shrine. I must be second to none in wealth, rank and influence."

"But surely you would not purchase these at the expense of happiness?"

"At the expense of happiness! I tell you these things and happiness are identical. But I see you are displeased with me. Up here in the wilderness, you see, there is nothing to amuse one, but a little flirtation, otherwise I should die of melancholy. But, Grace, do not wear that sober face any longer, it is not becoming; and—hush—do not speak, I cannot listen to any more moralizing at present; but to make some atonement for the slight you think a 'dear friend' has received, I will tell you a bit of a compliment. When you left the room yesterday, Fred wished to know if you could not be persuaded to accompany us to-morrow. I told him of your engagement, and he did not urge the matter, but replied, 'That cousin of yours is the most beautiful creature I ever saw, present company excepted; and what a graceful figure, and what a lovely complexion.' I declare, Grace, it is improving this minute. Ah! cousin mine, I would not like you for a rival after a year's existence in fashionable society; but what do you think of the compliment? I would like to know how highly you appreciate it?"

"At its true value, Bertha."

"O, there comes Fred up the avenue; and now for my bonnet and shawl. Adieu."

The reader must pardon us if we digress a little, while we give a short sketch of the individuals thus unceremoniously brought before them.

Harry Weston was the adopted son of a farmer who lived among the hills of the 'old Granite State,' and from his earliest youth was inured to labor and to poverty. From his childhood he had evinced a great desire for a thorough education, and at the age of twenty-one, he had, by hard labor in the summer, and teaching in the winter, found means to fit himself for college, and was on the following year to enter an institution in his native State.

About this time he became acquainted with Bertha Alton, who with some good traits of character had two bad ones: one, she was a worshipper at Mammon's shrine, and prized wealth and display above everything else. Another was, she was a coquette; there was no disputing the matter—it had never been doubted since the time when at children's parties, she would deny a kiss in order to have it stolen, and then run pouting into the corner. She, like Harry, was an orphan, and lived with an aunt, who, though not rich, contrived to keep up appearances, at the sacrifice of domestic necessities. She had early instilled into Bertha the idea that wealth was the one thing needful, and educated her with the end, that she was to be mistress of a splendid establishment, always in view.

She had come from her city home to spend the summer with Grace's parents, for the first time since she was a child of three years old. Young, and very beautiful, she had been completely spoiled by flattery the first season that she entered the fashionable circle, where her aunt had reigned before her, its brightest ornament. Nor was Mrs. Gray yet tired of the homage she had commanded so long, and there was but little affection between her and her niece, whom she looked on as a mile stone to remind her of the length of her journey.

What Bertha might have been with different training is not for us to decide. Now she was proud, imperious and impulsive, and encouraged and sought Harry Weston's attention notwithstanding the resolution she fancied he had made to avoid her. Previous to her arrival, he and Grace had many a pleasant walk through the village, for Harry loved to tell her his plans, while the blood would rush to her cheek, and the fire to her eye, and she would speak words of encouragement, and predict for him a bright and brilliant future. But on cousin Bertha's arrival, these pleasant walks were discontinued, and in their place were boat-rides, picnics, and horseback excursions, and various other kinds of amusement, until Grace thought she did not have a quiet moment to herself.

But notwithstanding all this, Bertha declared she had never seen so dull a place, and heartily wished herself back in the city. Grace wished she was there, too, though she never owned so much, no, not even to herself, but she saw Harry was changed since the arrival of her handsome cousin, and it was with pain she saw her trifling with one whose every thought she believed was true nobleness. Bertha knew there was a struggle in Weston's heart, but she did not doubt that in the end she would conquer; for when had she failed in any conquest she had set her heart upon?

And she did not now fail. They went the whole round of lovers' experiences. They flirted and quarrelled, then became reconciled, and took morning rides and moonlight promenades; they read in the same volume, joined in the same dance at the village festival; but still the word love had not as yet been spoken by either.

But the time came. It is an old saying, that "birds of the air carry news;" whether true or not we do not pretend to say. But in some way Harry heard a rumor that he was not the only one the lady smiled on, and jealousy got the mastery; and in a paroxysm of doubt he revealed the full extent of his affection. Bertha smiled favorably on his suit, and with one of her most bewitching smiles, and with the most apparent earnestness, requested him not to doubt her; and for a brief season they were apparently very happy in each other's society.

Had Bertha fully understood the heart she was trifling with, she would have paused a moment ere she won and then cast it away for one with whom she had formed a slight acquaintance in her city home. Frederic Wilson had followed Bertha Alton, after a short acquaintance, during which he became fascinated with her beauty and brilliancy, into the country, to spend the remainder of his college vacation in her society.

Without being absolutely dissolute or vicious, he was possessed of no fixed principles, and without any particular aim in view, seemed to live a sort of butterfly life, thinking only of present amusement and gratification. Possessed of an ample fortune which would soon be at his own disposal, he did not see the use of troubling himself about the future, forgetting that in a country where the wheel of fortune is ever rolling, the princely merchant or millionaire of to-day may to-morrow be cast from his proud eminence, and obliged to labor with his own aristocratic hands for the comforts of life. There was a gleam of triumph on Bertha's face, as she saw Wilson had followed her to her country residence, and she thought he would be a far more eligible subject to display as a new lover, than the high-minded and honorable, though humble Harry Weston.

She had made an engagement to accompany Harry and Grace on a picnic excursion on the day of the commencement of our story. But a few moments after Weston bade her adieu, ere "Mr. Wilson" was announced; and Bertha, being a little ashamed of the unfashionable appearance of her country lover, determined, during the stay of the city bean, to treat him with a cold indifference which she doubted not would be readily forgiven should she again choose to favor him with her smiles.

There was a shadow of disappointment that passed over Harry's brow, which Grace did not fail to notice, when she told him Bertha would not accompany them; and she thought he did not enjoy the afternoon much. When returning home they met Wilson and Bertha, who seemed so much occupied with each other's society that they did not recognize Grace or Harry until they had almost passed; and then a smile from the gentleman, and a cool bow from the lady, caused the blood to tinge her cheek and a tear to start to her eye, more for her companion's sake than for her own.

Every haughty feeling was aroused when Harry saw the true state of things. The idea that he had been deserted for one like Wilson, was very mortifying to his pride; and though he was not one to love, when esteem, the necessary prelude to love, was gone, yet it was a long time before he could meet her calmly.

But all this did not evidently cause Bertha much trouble; her pride was gratified, in the knowledge that he once loved her, and she gloried in the thought that one whom her cousin could not win in her whole lifetime, had offered his homage at her shrine on the short acquaintance of three weeks.

Wilson's visits were now made almost daily, while Bertha who had ascertained that he was the possessor of a large fortune, strove to draw him to her side by a display of all the accomplishments she was mistress of. But while seated at Bertha's side, and playing with her fan, or discussing the merits of the last novel, or the talents of the new theatrical star his eyes would seek the window where Grace was engaged with her embroidery or book, with no slight interest.—It was late in the evening, and Grace sat alone in the little parlor. Bertha having got tired of waiting for Wilson, had retired to her chamber, a few moments previous. Grace was somewhat sad this evening, for Harry Weston had that day taken leave of her to commence his collegiate course at Dartmouth. He had always been so kind to her that she loved him as a brother—so Grace thought—for she had not yet analyzed the feelings with which she regarded him.

The door was softly opened, and before Grace was aware that any one had entered, a form was at her side, and the words, "Miss Lindon," caused her to give a sudden start, and she saw Frederick Wilson.

"Please to be seated, Mr. Wilson, and I will call Bertha directly."

"But it is not Miss Alton that I came to see; as I passed the window I saw you were alone, and I entered to have a few moments' conversation, if you will do me the favor to listen."

Again she motioned for him to be seated, wondering what he had to communicate. He placed himself at her side.

"It is but a short time that I have known you, Miss Lindon, but short as the time is, I have learned to love you; do not start, but listen to me—hear me, I have—"

"But Mr. Wilson, I cannot listen to you; you have been my cousin's constant companion for the last few weeks, bestowing on her all a lover's attentions, and now to insult me with a declaration like this. Go, and I will forget it."

"But I love her not! O, Grace, I love her not; ever since I have known your true, noble soul, uncontaminated by the conventionalities of frivolity and fashion, this heart has been faithful to its worship of thee. I am weary of the hollow show and glitter which have surrounded me from childhood; of the heartless, useless life I am living, with myself. I am weary of the world, and all but you, that it contains. But O, Grace, give me but leave to hope, and from this hour I will commence a new life; I will endeavor to make some being the wiser, and better, and happier, for my having lived. Give me only leave to hope, even at a far distant day, when I shall be more worthy of you, and you shall see that with that hope of your love, I will become a different being."

"I cannot give you a shadow of hope; but indeed I wish you happy; and believe me, you can be so without the poor reward of my love; there is a higher purpose to live for, than human approbation; there are tears to be wiped from the eyes of the sorrowing; there are many faint and weary ones that bow in anguish, not thinking that a kind Father ordains all in infinite goodness and wisdom."

"And with you to counsel and direct—but I see by your averted face, that it is useless to say more—Farewell," and pressing her hand to his lips, he was gone. * * *

"Strange, Wilson has gone without taking leave of me," said Bertha Alton one morning, as she and Grace sat gazing out of the window; "but it is getting so dull here. What has become of Harry Weston?"

"He went away last week to Hanover."

"O yes, I had forgotten. It was too bad to win him from his allegiance to you, sweet cousin; but, indeed, I did not know that it would cause that cheek to flush and the voice to tremble at the mere mention of his name."

"It is not that, Bertha; you know he never cared for me, but I believe he loved you, and it was not worth causing a pang to a heart like his, for the mere gratification of an idle vanity."

"But then it is so pleasant to think I have listened to three declarations of love, and next Wednesday is my seventeenth birthday. It is strange Wilson should have left me as he did, after taking the trouble of coming here, when he might have been at Newport or Saratoga; but never mind we shall meet again, and I will repay him for past neglect." * * *

Four years had fled by, each one laden with changes and histories of its own, since Bertha Alton and Grace Lindon sat in the little brown cottage home of the latter. Those four years had proved sad pages in Grace's life history, for during that time her parents had gone to immortality, leaving their eldest daughter the guide and protector of their three younger children.

Mr. Lindon had not possessed a large share of this world's goods and the cottage was sold to pay the expenses of his illness. The clergyman who lived in Grace's native village, offered to take the two younger children until something could be provided for their support, and Grace had taken the situation of governess, and her salary enabled her to support herself and one of her sisters who was now attending a school a short distance from the city. * * *

"The invitations are all given out, Bertha, are they not?" said Mrs. Gray, as she sat in her elegant drawing-room, gazing intently into the face of her companion.

"They are all sent, with the exception of Mrs. Montague's, but I have hesitated about sending hers. She patronizes Grace so much, that I fear she will be angry if she is not included in the invitation."

"I invite a governess! and the talented and aristocratic Mr. Weston to be one of the guests! I do not fancy it would be a very pleasant party to her. With the exception of Mrs. Montague, there will be no one for her to speak to the whole evening."

"But she met Wilson the summer that I spent at Uncle Lindon's, and he would not fail to recognize her. But after all, I do not think Grace will accept the invitation. Your coldness has entirely frightened her away, and it is a long time since she has called here."

"Ah, trust me for that; I saw how it would be when she was so constantly calling to see you, and I took particular pains to let her know her visits were not acceptable. I do not think she will come; and we may say in the note 'Mr. and Mrs. Montague and Miss Lindon, etc.' But this Mr. Weston; I never heard of him till the last two weeks. Since that time I have heard of nothing else; who is he? and where did he come from? He is wealthy, of course; did you not say he was intimate with the Pembertons?"

"He is very intimate with Colonel M——, and through him became acquainted with the Pembertons; whether wealthy or not I do not know, but it does not matter, for he has talents and eloquence that Colonel M—— says will win him a proud eminence in political life. I understand he has already received an appointment at Washington. I do not know what there is about this Mr. Weston, but there is surely something very familiar in his countenance; I think I must have met some one that had a slight resemblance, but I have never seen one half so noble and distinguished-looking; and then I think he must have felt the same with regard to me, for when I was introduced at Mrs. Hamilton's, he said something about its being so long time since had seen me, that he scarcely recognized me; and then when I looked up inquiringly, he saw by my looks that I did not know him, and apologized by replying that he met so many strange faces he might be pardoned if he sometimes made a mistake of the kind; but he showed me more attention than any other person present, with the exception of John Pemberton. I am glad he is so soon to be married; and aunt, you must spare no expense in my dress for this eventful evening, there is no knowing what the result will be."

"No expense shall be spared, Bertha, but you must remember that this game cannot be played much longer; and before two months have passed, the auctioneer's flag will wave over this door; but by that time you must be mistress of another mansion; and it will be your own fault if you are not so."

"Do not fear for me, aunt; it took some manoeuvring to bring Wilson to a declaration, but it came at last; when I replied, that never having thought of the matter, I would like a month to reflect on the affair, before that time the distinguished lawyer—but no more, it is time to call the carriage to go out and purchase the dress for the coming occasion."

It was late on the evening of the assembly at Mrs. Gray's, and anxious eyes were turned in the direction of the door, but all to no purpose. Bertha Alton had never looked more beautiful. The broad, dark braid of hair wound round her head, just above her forehead, gave an almost regal appearance to that superb face. The rounded arms were encircled with bracelets of pearls sprinkled here and there with diamonds, which glistened like stars in the midst of clouds. The dress of white satin fell in graceful folds around the queenly form, as she moved around the apartment, while murmurs of "brilliant," "beautiful," ran around the room. If he could only see her now—so Bertha thought, but he came not; she had been told that he went but little into such assemblies, but she had thought he would come to-night. She did not condescend to notice her cousin Grace, who was quietly seated in a corner with her simple muslin, without ornament, save the single rosebud in her hair. Once, only once, Mrs. Gray had spoken to her, and then the words: "So you came this evening? Bertha thought you would not, you went into society so little since you lost your parent," caused the tears to start to her eyes, and the regret that she had yielded to the solicitations of Mrs. Montague to be present at the assembly. But hark! Miss Pemberton, Colonel M—— and Mr. Weston are announced.

Bertha Alton was leaning listlessly on Fred Wilson's arm, without hearing half the remarks he addressed to her, but suddenly her eyes flash with new light, the smile plays around her mouth, and the bloom on her cheek betrays strong emotion. She withdraws her hand from Wilson's arm, and there was no lack of animation now, for she did her best to please, as she stood at the side of the admired and gifted stranger.

Weston was indeed a fine and distinguished-looking man, with large, full, hazel eyes, fringed with long, black lashes, and his countenance at that moment was half serious. His features were marked and fine, combined with great vigor and character of expression, varying with every changing feeling or momentary emotion. After conversing a few moments with Bertha Alton, he retired to the recess of a window, and stood gazing upon the crowd down the room; soon his eye rests on a fair girl, of a sweet loveliness that might have won from the most fastidious that admiration given to personal beauty. But Weston had grown indifferent as well as fastidious, and why should his eye rest there with more than its wonted interest?

Soon he crossed the room and with frank cordiality reached out his hand.

"I trust I do not need an introduction here," he said, a moment afterwards, placing himself by her side.

How little he needed it the flushed cheek and trembling hand which he had detained might have told him, but not for worlds could she at that moment have spoken.

"You seem quite retired, this evening, Grace; you must still allow me to call you Grace, for it seems so cold and hollow to use formality to one who was my earliest friend and companion. But see, the guests are about descending to the refreshment room; please allow me to conduct you?"

Bertha saw Weston leading her cousin through the hall, and she gazed in amazement. Where could they have met? But from parts of the conversation which she heard, the past all came back to her mind; and overwhelmed with mortification and disappointment, she did not again seek his society, but at the expiration of Wilson's month of probation she became his wife, and removed with him to a distant city. * *

Years have passed away and Harry Weston's movements have been chronicled, as matters of interest to the public. But to sketch the progress of such a character through the shifting scenes of his upward career; to observe him in his associations with the great, the daring and acute, should be the work of a more gifted pen. One simple incident shall close our story:

"Who do you think, dearest Grace," said the Honorable Harry Weston, to his wife, "I have engaged for my private secretary?"

"I am sure I cannot imagine."

"The husband of Bertha Alton, that was; he has spent a large fortune, and this morning came to me for employment, so I took him for a short time on trial."

INVENTOR OF PICKLED HERRING.

Some of our most valuable inventions are of so simple a character that the only wonder about them seems to be that they were never found out before. It is said that the emperor of Russia has just returned from a visit to the little town of Borgo, on the Baltic, where he took part in the ceremony of laying the foundation of a monument to the memory of the fisherman Beukels, who first introduced the plan of preserving herrings by salting and packing them. Formerly the vast numbers of herrings which were captured on the northern and western shores of the empire, were lost to the world by the rapid decomposition of the fish. Beukels conceived the happy idea of salting them, and having instructed his neighbors how to preserve them by this process, went himself to Finland and taught the Fins how to deal with the fish. As a reward for his public spirit the name of Beukels has been handed down to posterity as a benefactor of mankind. The emperor Charles the Fifth visited his tomb; Peter the Great granted a pension to one of his descendants, and now Alexander has laid the foundation stone of a monument to be erected in his honor.—Portfolio.

Wisdom allows nothing to be good that will not be so forever—no man to be happy but he that needs no other happiness than what is within himself—no man to be great or powerful that is not master of himself.

LULEE :

—OR,—

THE FAIR SLAVE OF ISMID.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

THE city of Ismid is situated at the head of a gulf of the same name, and is touched by the great road from Constantinople to the southward. The place contains but little of material interest, save one old castellated structure, and the remains of antiquity which are to be found in the yards of the tomb-stone corners. It was anciently the seat of the kings of Bithynia, and once the residence of Hannibal, and if I may believe the begging tshawooska who acted as my guide, I had the pleasure of standing in the very apartment where that mighty general used to sleep. But what I saw has little to do with my story.

Ismid is the seat of a pasha, and at the time of which I write Benmousoff held that high office. He was a fat, lazy Turk, over half a century old, and if he was honest it was because he could make the most money by being so. The pasha had one son named Gaib. This was his only child, and he loved him well—so well that he would even stretch his authority at times to please him. Gaib was five-and-twenty when for the first time in his life the thought of marriage entered his head. He did once make some advances to the daughter of the Capitan Bey, but he was coldly turned away, and all thoughts of love were banished. The truth was, Gaib was not only of a wilful and ugly disposition, but he was very homely in person, having only one eye, and being otherwise disfigured. So the youth resolved that he would not force himself upon the fair sex again until he could find one whom he could command to share his lot.

One day Gaib entered his father's presence in great haste.

"What is it, my son?" the old pasha asked, noting the youth's excitement.

"In the market-place—at the shop of old Abraham—there is a Greek girl named Lulee. She is for sale. I want her for a wife."

"A wife, Gaib? And will my son take a wife from among the Greeks? Can you find—"

"Stop, my father. Go first and see Lulee. Such beauty ne'er before was meted out to human form. I must have her, and you must go and see her?"

"But how much does the old Jew ask for her?"

"He asks two thousand piastres."

"A great sum, my child."

"For great worth. But come—you must go with me to the market. My heart is set upon the possession of this slave, and I must have her."

The pasha saw that his son was determined, and he threw on his beneish, and prepared to follow on to the bazaar. When the father and son reached the shop of Abraham, they were at once admitted to the room where the slave was. Even the old pasha was wonder-struck by the girl's marvellous beauty. She was not over seventeen, and as fair as the very roses that clustered about the lattice near which she sat. There was much of the voluptuous in her round, full, perfect form; but in her beautiful face all was purity and native modesty, with a tremulous, shrinking expression, which revealed but a little of the anguish which lay at her heart. Her story, as told by the Jew, was simply this: About a year before she had been stolen away from her home in Greece and brought hither by a corsair. He (the Jew) bought her at once, and had since kept her at work in his kitchen. But now he had found a cheaper cook, and he wanted the money for the fair Greek.

Benmousoff acknowledged that he had never before seen a female so lovely, and knowing that no respectable free woman would take his son for a husband, he resolved to buy the lovely slave. Accordingly he paid over to the Jew two thousand piastres, and the maiden was delivered into his keeping.

"You are mine now," the pasha said, as he took the girl by the hand to lead her away.

Lulee crouched close to the old man, at the same time casting upon Gaib one of those frightened looks such as a fawn might give a wolf. She drew down her veil, and then Benmousoff led her from the place. When they reached the pasha's seraglio, Gaib followed them.

"Lulee," spoke the old man, "you may banish all your fears, for your station is to be an honorable one. My son takes you for his wife."

"Your son!" uttered the Greek, with a fearful start. "Where is he?"

"He stands by your side."

Lulee cast one frightened look upon the young man, and then, with her small white hands clasped, she uttered:

"Spare me—O, spare me! I can cook, and wash, and scrub; and I can be as faithful as the sun. But spare me from this! O, have compassion!"

First Gaib's countenance assumed a troubled, chagrined expression, but a look of anger quickly followed. He moved to the maiden's side and placed his hand upon her shoulder.

"Lulee," he said, in a low, hissing tone, "you are to be my wife. If you are wise, you will beware. There are tortures more painful than death—and fate may hold in store a position worse than that of wife!"

With a quick, cold shudder, the poor girl shrank back and covered her face. The wild heaving of her bosom told how deep was her agony, but no tears came to relieve her burdened soul.

"Yes, Lulee," said the old man, "thou art for my son, and he will make thee his wife. Be faithful, and thou shalt be happy."

Ere long the fair slave was conducted to the apartment which had been set apart for her, and here, when she was alone, she wept. Little dreamed the pasha and his son the secret of the Greek girl's heart.

Night came on, and a black slave came and lighted the lamp which hung in Lulee's room. It emitted a grateful perfume as it burned, and cast a soft light upon the place. Surely the apartment was a sumptuous one, and the eye tired not in viewing the costly trappings that decorated the ceiling and walls. Yet Lulee noticed it not. With her head bowed, she groaned in the deep agony of her soul, and anon a bursting prayer came forth from her lips. Thus she sat when her door was slowly, noiselessly opened, and a human being, muffled up in a long cloak, entered the apartment. Lulee started up, and the expression upon her face was a curious one. There was more of some strong, reckless determination, than of resignation. And then her right hand was hidden in her bosom, and one who had stood by her side might have seen that she clasped the jewelled hilt of a small dagger.

The person who had entered stood a moment near the door, and as he seemed to have recognized the maiden, he let the cloak fall from his shoulders and then turned his gaze full upon Lulee. He was a young man—not over three-and twenty—tall and nobly formed, with these dark eyes and richly flowing hair, and those pure, classical features which mark the Greek youth.

"Lulee," he said, in a low, sweet tone, "have I found thee at last?"

"Alphon!" burst from the maiden's lips, and she gave a spring forward. "I am not deceived! O, speak to me!"

But ere he could speak, she was folded to his bosom, and for a while the two wept in silence.

"Lulee—Lulee," the youth whispered, in a tremulous, fearful tone, "art thou yet a wife?—the wife of any man?"

"No, no, Alphon," the maiden quickly uttered. "O, no. So far Gpd has been most kind."

"But the old pasha bought thee for a wife?"

"Ay—for his son. But no stain should have come upon me. I am prepared. Since first I left my native shores I have not lost this last, sure friend." As she spoke, she drew forth a small dagger, and the expression which rested upon her face at that moment showed that Gaib could never have found a living wife in his slave.

"Bless thee," the youth murmured, as he again caught the fair girl to his bosom. "Lulee, I have found thee at last, and henceforth we live or die together. For one long year I have searched for thee in vain. When they snatched thee from our home, I knew it not until two days had passed. Who was it that did the deed—and how?"

"A foul corsair—a Turk—landed near our cot at Dyro—and I was upon the beach. The demon seized me and bore me off, and brought me here and sold me to the old Jew, with whom I have lived ever since until this day."

"I sought that Jew, for I had learned that thou wast with him," returned Alphon, folding the maiden again to his bosom. "I saw him but half an hour after the pasha had taken thee away, and since then I have watched about this place. I was in the garden when they brought thee to this room, and I saw thee pass in. I saw the black when she came to light the lamp, and when she was gone I staked my life upon the hazard of reaching thee. A friendly vine gave me access to the balcony of the corridor, and with my dagger I easily picked the lock of the outer door. Now flee with me. A vessel awaits my coming."

"Flee?" murmured Lulee, gazing first into Alphon's face, and then bowing her head until it rested upon his bosom.

"Ay. Thou hast not forgotten our vows, sweet Lulee. Thy heart is not—"

"—sh! Mistake me not. O, Alphon, for this long year I have only lived in the love of thy noble heart. In the darkest hour of all that time I have never wholly lost my hope of seeing thee once more. Flee? O, yes. I could face a thousand deaths so that I only gained a step towards the land of my birth, and the home of my father. Lead the way, beloved."

Lulee raised her head from her lover's shoulder as she spoke, and she had just turned to obtain a light capote which hung near, when a heavy step was heard in the corridor. The lovers started with affright, for now each had something beside self at stake.

"Flee!" gasped Lulee.

"But whither?" asked Alphon, gazing quickly around.

There was no place within the apartment for concealment, and if there had been the youth could not have reached it, for hardly had the words passed from his lips when the door was opened, and Gaib entered the chamber; and as he gave utterance to an oath of astonishment and rage, Alphon drew his dagger. But Gaib moved not towards him. He took a wiser course. As soon as he could comprehend the meaning of what he saw, he leaped back into the corridor and called out for his slaves. It so happened that four stout eunuchs were engaged within a short distance, and they were quickly upon the spot.

"In there!" cried Gaib, pointing to the room he had just left. "Seize the dog and bind him!"

The eunuchs rushed in with yatagans drawn, and but for Lulee the youth would have been instantly killed, for he had prepared to fight to the last. She knew his bold, daring spirit, and she saw the danger which threatened him; so she threw herself upon him, murmuring as she did so: "Die not now, Alphon."

On the next moment the youth was seized by both arms, and he could resist no more.

"Away with him!" shouted Gaib. "Take him to the prison and tell the keeper the pasha sent him."

The ill-fated youth cast one look upon Lulee ere he was led away, and as he turned from her she fell fainting to the floor. Gaib raised her up and laid her upon a seat, and then called some of the women, who were quickly on hand. The young man waited an hour, but Lulee still remained unconscious, and he retired. Once she opened her eyes, and a ray of intelligence gleamed therefrom, but it quickly passed away.

Midnight came, and Gaib returned to the chamber, but he found the beautiful Greek now raving. He stood awhile by her side, but she seemed not to know him.

"That was a jacin, or some evil genie, who came in here," said one of the women.

But Gaib made no reply. He waited until he was assured that she had not her senses, and then he departed. Two of the females were left to watch by the couch of the Greek. It was some two hours after Gaib had gone that Lulee opened her eyes and found the two women asleep. She gazed quickly about, and then she clasped her hands and prayed, and the name of Alphon was in her prayer. While she was thus engaged, one of the watchers awoke. In an instant the expression of Lulee's countenance changed, and only meaningless words dropped from her lips.

"Poor thing!" uttered the sympathizing black. "It was surely some child of darkness who came here to see her—perhaps Eblis himself. Fair lady, how feel you?"

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Lulee, with a wild expression. And then she muttered over many words of no meaning.

The daylight came, and Gaib visited his slave again, but he gained no reason from her. He sent for the physician, and when the man of drugs came, he asked him to cure his beautiful beloved. The physician examined her case, and then shook his head.

"Her reason hath left her," he said.

"But what shall cure her?" asked Gaib.

"Some of my medicine, and patience," answered the physician.

Accordingly he dealt out some simple drugs, and promised to call again on the following morning, if not sent for before.

Once during the day Lulee was left alone, for her attendants thought her asleep. When they were gone, she arose to a sitting posture and clasped her hands.

"O God of all mercy!" she calmly but fervently prayed, "save him, O save him! Let not the hand of evil fall upon him." Then she bowed her head, and not until she heard the footsteps of the coming attendant did she lie down again. And when the attendant had come that look of intelligence had passed away, and the honest women who watched her thought her still insane.

And so the night came again, and when Gaib came he found his purchased bride still insensible to his presence. He gazed upon her a few moments in silence, and then, with a sudden earnestness, he clasped his hands and hastened from the apartment.

Alphon sat upon the cold stone floor of one of the deep, strong dungeons of the prison of Ismid. The day had gone, and the deep blackness of starless night was upon him. No chains were yet upon his limbs, for the dungeon was strong enough. He sat there, with his hands clasped, and he only looked for death to release him from the place. Thus he sat when the sound of feet were heard without—then came the creaking of the heavy bolts—and then the door was opened, as the prisoner could tell, not only by the grating of the rusty hinges, but also by the stream of light which came pouring into the dungeon. The new-comer was enveloped in a sort of long perdjee, but for a while the sudden transition to such light deprived the prisoner of the power of sight.

"Prisoner," spoke the intruder, placing his lantern upon a low wooden bench, "I have come to ask a few questions of thee; and if you value your future welfare, you will give me truthful answers."

It was the voice of Gaib. The youthful prisoner knew it in a moment. But ere he answered, his eyes had become used to the light, and he could now quite plainly distinguish his visitor's features.

"Speak on," he calmly answered, rising to his feet; for until this moment he had remained in a sitting position.

"You were in one of the apartments of the pasha's harem last night, and with the young Greek girl, named Lulee?" said Gaib.

"I was," replied Alphion.

"Now tell me why you were there?"

The prisoner paused ere he answered, but he finally resolved to tell the truth.

"I will tell you," he said, at length: "Long ere the gentle Lulee was torn away from her home I knew and loved her, and, more than that, she loved me. I had asked her to become my wife, and she had promised. When the foul Turk stole her away I was absent. O, had I been there they should have found their graves in the sands of our coast! But I was away. When I returned, Lulee was gone. Her poor old father limped out and told me the sad story. He had seen the whole, but he could not prevent it. I started off, and for the long year I have searched in vain until yesterday, when I learned that she had been taken to your seraglio."

"And why came you to her?"

"To free her from your power."

"And for nothing else?"

"Else?" repeated Alphion, with a burning cheek. "Beware, sir, that you do not—"

"Hold," uttered Gaib, in a tone of relief. "I believe your words. I feared at first that you meant a more accursed blow than to deprive me of her presence. But I knew not why you were there, and hence have I come to see you."

"Did not Lulee tell thee?"

"No. She could not."

"Could not?"

"No. Her mind is unbalanced. She has spoken no word of sense since you were with her."

The Greek youth started as he heard this, and for a moment he stood as one fear-struck; but on the next instant he trembled as though an electric shock had passed through his system, and then his features settled into a look of strange intent.

"Is the maiden sick?" he asked; but in a tone which, to a close observer, would have shown that his real thoughts had nothing to do with the question.

"Not very," was the answer.

"Poor Lulee!" murmured Alphion, bowing his head and covering his face with his hands. "Thou art lost to me forever!" Yet the speaker lost not sight of his visitor, for had Gaib looked sharply he might have seen, like a diamond in the dark with a single ray of light reflected from it, the gleaming of the youth's dark eye.

But Gaib suspected nothing. He believed that the Greek's agony had crushed him. He stood, with his hands folded in his capote, silently and earnestly regarding the prisoner. In an instant the Greek bounded forward and forced Gaib back upon the wooden bench, and, ere the astounded man could recover, his short sabre was taken from him and he was defenceless.

"Now, foul Turk," uttered Alphion, between his clenched teeth, "thou art in my power, and as sure as there is a Great Spirit who sees us both, I will kill thee if thou dost not obey me! Mark me—I fear not the taking of thy life, for well do I know that I have been doomed. I would kill thee as I would crush the asp I found among my choice fruit!"

"Mercy! Do not murder me here in cold blood! I will cry—"

"—sh!" interrupted the Greek. "Make but one sound above thy breath, and this weapon finds thy heart. I speak not idly now. But obey me, and thou shalt be spared. Do as I bid thee, and I'll harm thee not."

"And what wouldst thou?" Gaib gasped, utterly fear-stricken.

"Remove thy capote and thy beneish—thy sash and belt—thy shoes and trowsers, and cap. Come—hasten."

"But wherefore this?"

"To save me the work of killing thee, and then taking these things from thy dead body."

"But what want you with them?"

"Mind you not that. I only bid you remove the garments.—By the powers of heaven, sir, you live not a minute longer if you hesitate!"

Gaib gazed upon the prisoner's powerful frame—he felt the iron grip upon his arm—and, moreover, he saw the gleaming sabre pointed to his heart. With a deep groan he threw off his feredjee, or capote; then he removed his beneish—a cloth garment, worn over the linen jubbee. But here he hesitated.

"What would you do with these things?" he eagerly asked.

"Why, since thou art so inquisitive, I will tell thee: I would make my escape from this accursed place; and when once clear of it I will never be found in Iamid again. Now off with thy shoes, and then the trowsers."

"But—"

"Ha! Shall I strike?"

"Hold! Mercy!"

"Quick, then!"

Gaib quickly divested himself of his shoes and trowsers, and when this was done the Greek seized him and threw him down. With his handkerchief he firmly bound the young Turk's arms behind him, and then with his red woollen scarf, or sash, he as firmly bound his legs. This done, he lifted Gaib to a sitting posture, and then, with the latter's own kerchief, he bound up his mouth so firmly that he could not utter a sound above a mere guttural groan.

Alphion's next move was to remove his own upper garments, and in their place he donned those of his victim. When he had wound Gaib's sash about his loins, and buckled on his sabre, and donned the heavily tasselled cap, he turned to the bound man, and said:

"Now I fancy that I may pass in the dark for the pasha's son. If the jailor treats you as well as he did me, he will bring you a crust of bread in the morning, and then he may set you free. Farewell—and if I never see you again, you may keep my poor garments in remembrance of one who has only placed you in durance for a few hours that he might escape an ignominious death."

The poor Turk made a desperate movement, but he could not arise to his feet, and without waiting longer, Alphion picked up the lantern and turned towards the door. When he reached the low vaulted passage, he closed the door after him and bolted it, and then he hastened away toward the stairs. He remembered well the way by which he had come down, and he had no difficulty in finding the same way back. He had to ascend only one flight of steps, and though the upper corridor was long and narrow, yet it was straight, and ere long the fugitive came to the office. There were two Arnaouts there, one of whom was asleep over a sort of leewan, while the other sat bobbing his head over his pipe. But they both started up as Alphion entered, and looked as energetic and wakeful as two weasels.

"Suppose I leave this lantern here," said the Greek, imitating Gaib's voice as nearly as possible, and hiding the imperfection that might exist in a grunting, hasty whisper. He knew not whether the lantern belonged to the prison or not, but he was on the safe side.

"As you please, jewel of the age," returned one of the Albanians, bowing low.

So the youth set the lantern down; but as he was about to turn away, the last speaker interrupted him:

"Does the dog die to-morrow?"

"Yes. But you may carry him his breakfast."

"We will obey."

In a few minutes more the youthful Greek was in the street. He felt assured now, and with a bolder step, he hastened on. There was no moon, but the stars were all out, and Alphion knew his way.

Lulee lay upon her couch, and near her sat two female blacks. One of them was sleeping while the other kept watch. The maiden seemed to be sleeping, though ever and anon her eyes would open, and some incoherent sentences fall from her lips. Thus she lay when the door of the apartment opened, and a man entered.

"Who is it?" asked Lulee, in a quick whisper.

"It is our master—Gaib."

"Slaves," spoke the intruder, turning his face from the light, and letting the heavy tassels of his cap dangle over his brow and eyes, "leave me with my betrothed for a while. Go to your own apartments and sleep, and when I am tired of watching I will send for thee."

This was spoken in a low, hoarse whisper, as though the speaker were afraid of disturbing the seeming sleeper. The slaves seemed glad to obey the order, for they quickly arose, and with low bows, they made their way from the room. When their footsteps had died away in the distance, the youth turned towards the couch.

"Lulee!" he pronounced, in a low, sweet tone.

The maiden started up with a wild movement.

"Who spoke?" she uttered, gazing into the man's face.

"—ah! Make no noise, loved one. 'Tis thine own Alphion. But say—is thy mind strong now?"

The maiden moved quickly forward and threw her arms about her lover's neck.

"Yes, yes, Alphion—and it has not been otherwise. It was but a deception of mine to stay the dreadful fate which seemed so near. But how is this? Surely, this is Gaib's garb."

"Yes; and Gaib now lies bound in the very dungeon where I was thrown. He came to learn who and what I was, seeing that he could gain nothing from you. But wait not now; we can talk of this hereafter. Hasten now and prepare thyself, for the way is open before us. Before I came up I saw that one of the gates was open, and the coast clear. O, hasten, Lulee, and look boldly forward, for liberty and home are before us!"

Lulee needed no second bidding. She threw on such articles of clothing as were at hand, and then turned to her lover. He led the way to the corridor, and from thence out upon the balcony. There he unwound the long, silken sash from his loins, and quickly knotting the end, he bade Lulee seize it and hold fast. Then he lifted her over the railing, and without difficulty lowered her to the earth. Then he followed by means of the grape vine, which he had used once before, and when he reached the maiden's side he caught her hand and led her quietly away through the garden. The gate was found and readily opened, and in a few moments more they were in the street.

Once they were stopped by a janizary, who seemed to have just awakened from a sound sleep, but he detained them not, for he quickly recognized the son of the pasha. Alphon took his way towards the southern portion of the city, and with rapid steps they kept on until they had reached the foot of the hill upon which the town stands, and shortly afterwards the youth stopped before a small wooden house and knocked loudly, at the same time giving a whistle peculiar to the Greek boatmen. In a few moments the door was opened, and a man, habited in the garb of a Greek sailor, made his appearance with a small lantern in his hand.

"Otho," spoke the applicant, "I am here with my holy prize. O, if you love me, let us be off at once!"

"Ha! Alphon? By heavens, 'tis! But come in. My crew are all on hand.—And is this our gentle Lulee?" the sailor continued, as he entered the house. "O, 'tis. You know me, Lulee?"

"Yes, good Otho."

But enough of this. The stout sailor wiped a tear from his eye as he felt the gentle pressure of Lulee's warm lips upon his rough cheek, and then he turned and left the apartment. Ere long he returned, followed by three others of like profession, and Lulee quickly comprehended that the noble, generous Otho had volunteered himself, his crew, and his vessel, in the work of assisting Alphon to find and to rescue her.

The party soon set out with Otho now for their guide, and at the distance of half a mile they came to a small cove wherein lay a boat. They entered, and were soon skipping over the wind-ruffled waters of the gulf. The vessel was reached, and just as the moon arose, which told that 'twas the hour of midnight, the sails were spread, and under a fair breeze the little polacca started off. Long before daylight the swiftly flying craft had reached the sea of Marmora, and by the morning of the day after she entered the Mediterranean. * * *

At the door of a small cot which stood close by the beach of Dyro, where the mountains of Maina sweep almost down to the water's edge, and where lived those hardy Greeks who had never bowed to the proud Turk, sat an old man who held in one hand a crutch. His head was silvered over with the frosts of many years, and his once noble face was deeply furrowed both by time and care. He sat there watching the movements of a polacca which had anchored in the little bay. A boat was coming off, and he could see that 'twas full of his own countrymen. Soon it touched the beach, and a light form sprang out upon the sand. It was a female form—and with a wildly beating heart the old man started up. On came the fairy-like form, bounding like a roe, and in a few moments more she flung her arms about the old man's neck, and as a flood of warm tears gushed forth she murmured the name of "Father."

"Lulee! Lulee! My own loved, lost Lulee!" gasped the transported parent, as he strained his child to his bosom.

Ay—it was Lulee; and ere long Alphon also came for the old man's blessing. And then Otho and his noble followers came to share the joy.

One bright Sabbath morning a happy party were assembled in the little chapel of Dyro. That same white-haired old man was there, and so were Alphon and Lulee—and there the old vow was repeated by the two youthful lovers, and under its virtue the priest made them one for life.

Lulee never heard from her Turkish master again, and the memory of her servitude in Ismid was but as the passing of a summer's cloud. It gave her no pangs of grief nor did it ever cause her to shudder, for now her happiness was the more apparent, and the breath of her native shores and mountains was made doubly sweet by the contrast. She kept the little dagger, for it was to that she had once given her all of honor in charge; while her husband kept the gaudy trappings of Gaib as a memento of that unfortunate wife-hunter, whom he had left locked up in a dark dungeon, and who had since, by the death of his father and sublime appointment, become a pasha, but without a wife.

Without reason, there can be no religion; for in every step we take in examining the evidences of revelation, in interpreting its meaning, or in assenting to its doctrines, the exercise of this faculty is indispensable.

A HOME IN HEAVEN.

A home in heaven! O the blissful thought,
How it should stir our inmost heart with joy;
And a free gift, by Jesus' suffering bought,
What gratitude should all our mind employ.

A home in heaven! it eases all our pains,
To contemplate the glorious, blissful theme;
Away, dull earth, with all thy sordid claims,
With all thy pleasing scenes thou'rt but a dream.

A home in heaven! could heart desire more?
To be with God in that celestial land;
O, bliss unspeakable! my cup runs o'er;
Great Father, take me quick to thy right hand!

A home in heaven! the summit of all bliss,
Where God the Father will be all in all,
And the bright home where Christ the Saviour is,
Before whose throne a ransomed world will fall.

A home in heaven! the climax of delight,
Where all the blest shall live and love forever,
And our bright sun may never set in night,
But endless day roll on, and on forever.

A home in heaven! unspeakable ecstasy!
Dissolve our hearts in fervid, perfect love;
O, the sublime and rapturous thought, to be Submerged and swallowed up in God—above.

A MYSTERIOUS MANIFESTATION.

BY N. T. MUNROE.

It was a still, warm, pleasant summer evening, and Mrs. Sherman had just succeeded in hushing the last baby into a sound sleep, and stood by the window looking out upon the quiet scene. She was a little weary, for the day had been warm, the children had needed a great deal of looking after, she was not very strong herself, and a feeling of relief came over her as she laid "the blessed baby" in its crib, safely for the night. The good man had gone out to a lecture, or concert, or something of the kind—she did not exactly know what—and as the evening was too warm for work, and the lounge looked very inviting, Mrs. Sherman threw herself down to indulge the weariness which the day's labor had induced. The soft evening breeze came into the open window and fanned her forehead as she lay there, and with thoughts of the dear children, the husband, and the many cares of her little household running through her matronly brain, she was fast yielding to the sleeping god, when the door-bell rung. One would have thought she had been attached to the bell-wire, by the suddenness with which she rose to her recumbent position.

"O dear!" said she, all in a tremor, "visitors, and I in such a state!" And she began to shake out her dress, smooth down her collar, and ran to the glass to brush her hair and make herself look presentable.

Her chamber door stood open, and while standing at the glass she caught sight of her domestic's face, which caused her to stop her preparations and turn short round with a "For mercy's sake, Bridget, what is the matter?"

"O, ma'am, the bell rung and I went to the door, and sure not a living soul was there."

Mrs. Sherman was easily startled, and her heart beat quick at the intelligence; but it would not do to let the affrighted servant know her weakness, so she merely said:

"It was some roguish boys, I suppose. Are you sure you fastened the door?"

"Yes, ma'am, but do you really suppose it was the boys?"

"Why, what else could it be?" said she.

"Goodness knows, ma'am, but the heart of me is leaping in my throat this minute." And turning on her heel she went down stairs.

Two or three minutes had scarcely elapsed when the bell rung again. Bridget went to the door, Mrs. Sherman leaned over the bannister—the door swung open—not a soul was there. Again the girl came rushing up the stairs.

"O, ma'am, nobody is there again; what can it be?" And her eyes stood out with fear and wonder.

"I don't know, I'm sure, Bridget, what it means!" And her own heart grew fainter every minute. "Don't go to the door again," said she, "no matter who comes, but stay up here with me."

In this state of fear and alarm the evening passed away, and when Mr. Sherman came home, he found, much to his surprise, no notice taken of his repeated ringing of the bell, and was obliged to walk round to the back door where his knock was answered by Bridget, in a great state of trepidation.

"Why, what's the matter, Bridget? Didn't you hear the bell?"

"O, Mr. Sherman, my mistress told me not to go to the door, no matter who rung."

"Why so, Bridget?"

"O, sir, such an evening as we have had; the house is surely haunted. The bell has done nothing but ring all the evening, and it's little but mistress and myself are frightened out of our wits!"

"What do you mean, Bridget? Who has been ringing the bell?"

"And it's just what we don't know, sir; but it rings when no mortal hand touches it."

"Some boys, I suppose," said Mr. Sherman, passing up stairs. Here the same story was repeated by his affrighted wife, and even while she was in the act of relating the strange events, the bell pealed forth again its startling summons.

"There it is again, George, what can it mean?" said Mrs. Sherman, clasping her hands over her trembling heart, for she was terribly nervous. Mr. Sherman went down and opened the door—not a soul was there. It was after ten at night; he went out and walked around the house; all was quiet; he even stood in the street watching the front door of his house, and even while he thus stood, the bell rung. It was very strange; no hand had touched the knob; what could it mean? He went in—his wife was in a terribly excited state, and Bridget was going round the house with wide staring eyes, calling upon all the saints in the calendar.

After much conjecture and cogitation they retired to rest, and for the remainder of the night the house was quiet.

The next morning they all slept late. The children woke first and clamored for their breakfast. Mrs. Sherman tried to shake off the effects of last night's fright, and proceeded to dress the little ones, when again the bell rung. She dropped the garment she held in her hand and listened. She heard Bridget open the door, but there was no voice, no inquiry. She rose and went and leaned over the bannister. The poor servant girl stood with the door open, staring with amazed looks into the street.

"Anybody there, Bridget?" she whispered.

"Not a soul, ma'am," she answered, in a mysterious tone.

"Shut the door, Bridget, and don't open it again." She obeyed.

"Sure it's as well not to be opening the door to folks who can come through the key-hole."

"What is to become of us, George?" said Mrs. Sherman, going back into her chamber. "I cannot live in this way."

"It does indeed seem very unaccountable," said Mr. Sherman.

Ding-a-ling, went the bell again, and Mrs. Sherman threw herself on the side of the bed and burst into tears. Mr. Sherman went down stairs and opened the front door, but not a soul was there!

"This is very strange," said he, with a half-vexed, half-puzzled air.

He passed out into the kitchen where Bridget was preparing breakfast, and here he was met with a most unwelcome surprise:

"O, what is to become of us," said she, "the silver spoons and forks are all gone. I have looked all around but I cannot find them. Sure, what has come upon the house."

The plot thickened; the spoons, the forks and other valuable articles were most surely missing, and Mr. Sherman began to think the house had been robbed. Just then his wife came down, and on hearing of the missing articles, it added not a little to her former state of nervousness.

"O, George, I cannot stay here! I cannot stay in this house another night," and she sank upon a chair and sobbed hysterically.

Some of the neighbors came in after breakfast, to whom the story was told, of the mysterious bell-ringing, and the missing articles. One said, some one must have been concealed in the house; another had not a doubt but it was spiritual manifestations; but Mrs. Sherman could not but wonder what use the spirits could have for spoons and forks. But all were puzzled and could come to no final solution of the mystery. Mr. Sherman asked himself a hundred questions. Could there be any one concealed in the house? and if so, could that person have rung the bell? for it was certain the bell was rung by no person outside; and then again, could a person conceal, ring the bell, the wire merely passing through the entry into the kitchen? This was preposterous. Could it have been rung without material agency? He believed not. As he was thus sitting in his study, he heard his wife's step as she passed through the entry to her chamber, she was going to get the babe to sleep. The house was silent save occasionally the sound of Bridget's footsteps as she pursued her work below stairs. As he sat thus, thinking what could be the cause of all this mystery, he began to feel himself yielding to the influence of sleep, when suddenly loud and long rung the bell, and almost simultaneously came a shriek from his wife's apartment. He started up and rushed to her chamber; she was pale with fright.

"O, George," said she, "what can this mean?"

"Be calm," said he, "I will go and see."

At this instant Bridget rushed up stairs.

"The blessed virgin protect me, but I cannot stay in the house another night!"

"Nonsense," said Mr. Sherman, who saw that his wife was growing paler and paler every minute, "what is going to hurt you? You needn't go to the door, and if robbers come, they cannot carry us off bodily."

So saying, Mr. Sherman went down and opened the door, and behold a form of flesh and blood stood before him.

"Ah, Sherman, how do you do?"

"Glad to see you, doctor, will you walk in?"

The gentleman proved to be the family physician; a small, brisk man, who carried a little cane, with which he was in the habit of giving vigorous little strokes or thrusts to himself, or anything which came in his way. He had bright, twinkling eyes, which danced from object to object, with the rapidity of thought; he had a quick, nervous way of talking; his hands were never still, his eyes were never quiet; he never sat more than five minutes in a place; he was the very spirit of unrest and nervousness. Just the one to delight in a little mystery for the mere sake of ferreting it out.

He followed Mr. Sherman into the parlor and took a chair, then suddenly jumped up again. With a little stroke of his cane upon his left leg, he said:

"I heard that something mysterious had happened in your house—bells ringing without hands and spoons disappearing—is it so?" And down went the little cane upon the other leg, as he whirled completely round and faced Mr. Sherman.

"Something of the kind has happened," said Mr. Sherman.

"Ah," said he, rubbing his hands nervously, and walking back and forth in the room, "tell me about it." And he sat himself desperately into a chair, and fell to tapping his boot with his cane.

Mr. Sherman related the case in as few words as possible, and when he had finished, the little man jumped from his chair and rushed to the front door.

"Let me see," said he, and his eyes sought the bell-wire. "Ah, it goes right along the ceiling, through the entry into the kitchen, all in plain sight, no chance for that, I see. I didn't know," said he, to Mr. Sherman, "but I could explain it. I heard your bell had rung without hands—I thought I might explain it—I knew of a case once, where the bell kept ringing mysteriously—folks got frightened half to death—wife got nervous—husband grew desperate, threatened to desert the house—I called in—I traced the bell-wire—it was carried through the ceiling, where the rats in their peregrinations had got hold of it, and caused all the fright—did not know but this might be so here; but it cannot be."

"Even if the rats had rung the bell," said Mr. Sherman, "they would not have been very likely to have carried off the spoons and forks."

"No, no," said he, shaking his head, "it was not rats, that's certain. I understand your wife is very uneasy about these things."

"Yes," said Mr. Sherman.

At this moment Mrs. Sherman entered the room.

"Ah, madam," said the little man, going forward to meet her, "happy to see you—sorry that you have such cause for alarm—very strange, very strange—but it will all come clear in time, you may depend; don't think it is spirits, or any of that nonsense. Little ones all well?" said he, abruptly.

Mrs. Sherman said they were.

"You are a little alarmed, I see—not to be wondered at with your nervous temperament—I would advise you to take aconite alternate with belladonna; you have the medicine, I presume? I have some patients to visit now; I will be back again soon." And the doctor hurried away.

When dinner was prepared, Mrs. Sherman was scarcely able to eat.

"I don't think, George, I shall be able to stay in the house to night, I am dreadfully nervous."

"I think," said her husband, "that after tea you had better take the children and go into Mrs. C——'s and spend the night."

This was agreed upon, and Mrs. Sherman took the children and went up stairs while Mr. Sherman, taking a book, went into the parlor. He laid down on the sofa and was fast asleep when his wife came in.

"George," whispered she, "I think Bridget is preparing to leave, for she came into my chamber, and the poor girl was dreadfully frightened, and said that for all the world she could not stay in the house another night. I told her I could not possibly spare her, she must not go. But she persisted, saying there were spirits about the house, she knew. She was sorry to leave me and the children, but she must go."

Mr. Sherman started up, and as he was going up stairs he met Bridget coming down, all dressed for her departure.

"Where are you going, Bridget?" said he.

"To my sister's, sir," said she.

"Not to-night?" said he.

"Yes, sir, I cannot stay in the house where there are such strange doings."

"Pooh, Bridget, go up stairs and take off your things, we cannot spare you; Mrs. Sherman is very nervous and wants you to help take care of the children."

"And indeed, haven't I nerves too?" said she, "and I cannot stay in the house another night."

"You needn't stay in the house to-night, you can go with Mrs. Sherman. I shall watch here so that your things will be perfectly safe."

Bridget looked sullen and displeased; however, she went up stairs, took off her bonnet and came down to the kitchen, where she was sitting moodily by the window, when the little doctor came in.

"Ah, how do you do, Bridget? I thought I would come in this way, so as not to disturb Mr.

and Mrs. Sherman. Has the bell rung much to-day?"

"Ah yes, sir, it is ringing all the time."

"And what do you suppose, Bridget," and he came close up to her, "what do you suppose is the cause of all this?"

"I am sure I cannot tell, sir."

"It frightens you a little, Bridget, doesn't it?"

"Ah, sir, and the life is scared almost out of me; and do you think it is the spirits, the same as the ladies tell about, that tips the tables and upsets the chairs?"

"I don't know, Bridget, but if spirits, they must be very bad ones. Is Mr. Sherman at home?"

"Yes, sir, he is."

"Will you call him?"

Bridget left the room. No sooner had she gone than the little doctor jumping into a chair, succeeding in securing a small piece of wire with a feather attached, to the tongue of the bell; after doing this he walked very quietly into the parlor, and was sitting there when Mr. Sherman, Mrs. Sherman and the children came in. They were talking very earnestly, when suddenly the bell was rung loud and long. They looked at each other a moment, then Mr. Sherman started for the door, followed by Mrs. Sherman and the children. The door was opened, no one was there. But where was the doctor? At the first alarm he had started for the kitchen where he found Bridget standing in the middle of the room, in a terrible state of alarm. He scarcely heeded her, but taking up the broom which stood in the corner of the kitchen, carried it into the parlor. Looking very attentively at this article of household labor, he pulled therefrom a small feather which he held between his thumb and finger with a very significant look. As his quick eye glanced over the group just returned to the room, he saw that Mrs. Sherman was very pale. He stepped to the kitchen door, "Bridget," said he, "bring a glass of water, your mistress is faint." He was still holding the broom in one hand, the little feather in the other, when she entered.

Mr. Sherman took the glass from her hand, and as she turned to leave the room:

"Bridget," said the doctor, "stop a moment." She obeyed.

"Bridget," said he, "I think you must know more about this bell-ringing than any one else, for it rings only when you are in the kitchen. What say, Bridget?" But Bridget said nothing.

"Without this broom I think you will be hardly able to go on with your operations, and as the amusement must be rather stale by this time, perhaps it would be as well to defer any more manifestations of your skill in this line; all that remains for you now, is to bring forward the missing articles."

Without a word of reply, but with the strongest indignation in her countenance and manner, the girl turned and left the room.

"Why, doctor," said Mrs. Sherman, "why do you accuse Bridget of all this trouble?"

"My dear madam," said the doctor, walking briskly up to her, "listen for a moment, and I will convince you. I knew that the bell would never ring without material agency, so I cast about me to think what it could be—I thought of Bridget—I determined to test her—I took a small piece of wire which I succeeded in securing to the bell, to this I attached a feather, in such a manner that the least touch would brush it off. Soon the bell rings—the door is opened—no one is there—I go out into the kitchen—take up the broom standing in the corner—behold, there is the very feather which I had attached to the bell—you perceive, madam, the inference I draw from all this?"

"But why should she do all this?"

"That is more than I know. I merely deal in facts. Has she been with you long?"

"Some weeks, and we like her very much."

"It would be well to search her trunk, as no doubt she will be packing off as soon as possible."

"I think, doctor, you must be mistaken. I don't think Bridget could be guilty, for she has been as much alarmed as any of us."

"Can't help it, madam; but I am convinced that no stronger agency has been at work, than this simple broom."

"But what possible benefit could this be to her, she will only lose her place thereby?"

"But you forget, my dear madam, that she did not intend being found out."

"You are very hard, doctor," said the kind-hearted lady. "I think you will yet find she is innocent."

Mr. Sherman who had been absent from the room, now entered.

"I have, by Bridget's request, searched her trunks and found nothing to confirm my suspicions, and she loudly protests her innocence."

Mrs. Sherman looked at the doctor with a triumphant air.

"I cannot help that," said the imperturbable doctor; "the bell-ringing and the robbery are by some means connected. Call Bridget, if you please."

Bridget was called, but as she came down the back stairs, the doctor stepped up the front. He went into her chamber, looked into her closet, it was empty, every article was in her trunk. He pulled the clothes from the bed—the mattresses from the bedstead—but found nothing—with his little cane he gave vigorous strokes to the feather bed, but nothing rewarded his search, and he stood for a few minutes as if nonplussed. Then he took up a pillow—pulled off the case—examined the ends very carefully—something attracted his keen eye—he squeezed the feathers in his hand—he pulled out his penknife and ripped open the end—out came the feathers—out came also silver spoons and forks—open came the other pillow, and out came more missing articles. He went to the stairs and called for Mr. Sherman; up came the gentleman and his wife.

"Look at here!" said the doctor, pointing to the feathers, spoons and forks, laying about the floor. "What do you think now, madam?"

Mrs. Sherman said nothing, but rushed to the door and screamed, "Bridget! Bridget!"

Bridget came, gave one look at the room and its contents, and stood as immovable as a statue.

"Do you know anything of all this, Bridget?"

"No, ma'am," said she.

"Have you any idea how all those things came into your pillows? Own the truth, Bridget and we will try and forgive you."

"I know nothing about them, ma'am."

"How can you say so, Bridget?" said Mrs. Sherman, the tears standing in her eyes.

"Why should I have done this, ma'am? What did I want of your spoons and forks? It's enough to have one's life frightened out of them by such doings. If I ever get out of this horrid house, sure and I'll never set foot in it again!"

"But how came these things in your pillows, Bridget?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," and so she persisted in her innocence, and left the house that very night taking all her effects with her; for Mrs. Sherman was so kind-hearted that she would not give her consent for her husband to pursue any vigorous measures against her, although circumstances went so much towards proving her guilt. Mrs. Sherman's shattered nerves gradually recovered their tone, the family quiet was restored, and whether Bridget was guilty or no, certain it is there was no mysterious bell-rings after her departure, and the silver was never after found stowed away in the pillows.

Some months after these strange occurrences, as Mr. and Mrs. Sherman were sitting together, the doctor came in holding a paper in his hand, and in his usual abrupt manner began:

"My dear madam, I have a paragraph I wish to read: 'Bridget MacCarthy was brought before the Police Court, charged with taking spoons and other valuable articles, from the family with whom she was at service. The court brought her in guilty, and sent her to the House of Correction for three years.'

Mrs. Sherman's work dropped from her hands. "Poor girl, I was in hopes that her experience here would have been a lesson to her. What can induce her to pursue such a course?"

"I suppose," said the doctor, with a very wise look, "it is an infirmity of her nature. I have heard of many cases of a similar character. In low life this disease is called the depravity of the heart—vicious propensity—in high life, it is treated with much more lenity, and is called, a monomania—a morbid state of the mind—and is considered more a misfortune than a fault; but it is my opinion that the disease is the same in both cases, and that a strict system of diet, and some wholesome restraint is necessary for the good of the patient; and even then, the disease often baffles all the skill and tact of the physician. I hope that poor Bridget's medical attendant will be successful in arresting the progress of her disease, for it is one of those complaints for which I am sorry to say homeopathy has no specific."

NOT TO BE DONE.

A pleasant correspondent of a Boston paper, writing from New Orleans, gives the following incident:

You can buy nothing in New Orleans (which is the case I believe in most southern and western cities), for less than a "picayune," one-sixteenth of a dollar. Coppers are hardly known; and "nine-pence"—Boston currency—pass indiscriminately for "bits" or one-eighth of a dollar. I was amused at a little incident which I saw on board one of the western boats. A man from the North tried to pass ten coppers upon a "Sucker," a native of Illinois, for a dime.

"What be they?" inquired the Sucker, turning over the coppers in unfeigned ignorance.

"I calculate they are cents," replied the Northerner. "Can't you read?"

"I reckon not," said the other; "and what's more, old boss, I allow I don't want to. What is cents, mister?"

"I vow to the judges," said the Northerner, "you are worse than the heathen! Cents is money, sartin! Ten of them are worth one dime. Can't you see it says 'E. Pluribus Unum,' that's the Latin for 'Hail Columbia!' and here it's inscribed, one cent."

"Look at here, stranger," responded the sucker, putting the thumb of his right hand into his ear, and inclining his fingers forward, "you may run that saw on a Hoosier, or a Wolverine, but I'm dod rosted if you Yankee me with the con-tusive stuff."

And he marched off to the social hall, to indulge in a drink of corn whiskey, in compliment to his own sagacity.

It is much better to endeavor to forget one's misfortunes, than to speak often of them.

LINES UPON A FINISHED JOURNAL.

BY JAMES F. FITES.

An open record now before me lies,
 With "Fins" on the page. It is to me
 A mirror of my mind, wherein I see
 The full reflection of my thoughts—my eyes
 Now wander o'er its pages, tracing here
 Some well remembered incident, long past,
 And here some playful fancy—here in haste
 I've jotted down a phantasy—a tear
 Is dropped upon this page, for here at last
 I see the name of one who from the earth has passed.

And Memory, true servant, doth recall
 Each sad or pleasing circumstance—my grief,
 My joy, which I have written on the leaf,
 Are conjured up before me by her call
 To be reflected o'er. The past is gone,
 And ne'er can be recalled by act of ours.
 "Thou unrelenting past!" The withered flowers,
 The sad misdeeds, for which no tears atone,
 All, all are thine. Thou dwell'st in gloomy towers,
 And naught escapes thy bleak, deserted, rock-bound shores.

Our lives are truly journals. May each page
 Be pure and white with record of good deeds;
 And as Time onward in his course proceeds,
 And outwardly we're changed by stealthy age,
 O, let not change pervade our hearts and souls—
 Let our life-journal be unspotted still—
 Let no dark stain disgrace it, let no ill
 E'er harm it, and when finally death rolls
 Our book of life—marks "Fins" at the last,
 We may lie down and sleep, unmindful of the past.

THE TREASURE OF THE STUDIO.

BY FRANCES M. CHESBRO.

THE winds and storms of half a century had swept about the half ruined walls of an old family mansion, located in the heart of the county of H—. It was a fine old aristocratic building, with balconies leading from the upper stories, large gothic windows with curiously carved shutters, that in the main building were closed throughout the whole season of storms and sunshine. The original part of this massive building had been for many years vacated; so long had human life been absent from it, that it had assumed a forbidding aspect. Its dark, sombre color had become even more gloomy by long neglect, moss clung to its roof, and rank weeds sprang up under the door sills and window crevices.

The older inhabitants of the town could remember when the mansion was alive with gaiety and beauty; young people and children kept away the sombre shadows by their gay voices, and the sunlight streamed into open windows, and lit up the dark panelling and carved ceiling with a rich beauty. It was then the residence of an old English family, who brought from their native country all the national customs and habits in which they had been bred. The Christmas holiday and festival fetes were scrupulously observed, and hospitality reigned here from the beginning of the new year till the last hour of its ending.

James Gordon, with his parents and young bride, came to this country with no further intention than travelling for pleasure, and being attracted by the beauty and romance of this mansion, bought it, and fitted it up according to their English tastes, thinking to make of it a permanent home. In a few years the aged parents died and left their large inheritance to the son, who had accompanied them to this new land and administered to their last hours. Here children were born to the young emigrants, who grew up in the enjoyment of comfort and luxury. Tutors and governesses were provided for the education of the young people, until the sons were fitted for a college life.

The eldest son, Richard, was a boy of rare promise. He combined in his character a strange and wild recklessness with the most intellectual tastes, not only for books and study, but for art. He had all a woman's delicate instinct for beauty in nature and life. He was a poet in soul, and his inspiration found expression through the pencil and canvass, rather than through the usual medium of poetic feeling. His excessive love of art drew away his mind from classical studies, and thus disappointed the hopes of his parents, who greatly desired him to follow the profession of the law.

It was useless to strive to influence the mind of the young student. Nature had designed him for an artist, and in no other sphere would he succeed. At the age of sixteen he entered the university, and for the first time in his life went out from the influences of home. Tutors had been provided for his previous preparatory studies, so that life outside these mansion walls was new and strange to him.

Among the inmates of the family at this period of their history, was a young English girl, a distant relative, who was called by them Cousin Emma. She was the orphan child of an old and tried friend of James Gordon, who having died a few years previous, while in this country, left little Emily to the care and protection of his old friend. Her mother had died in the child's infancy, and the father's great anxiety and trust had been to educate and accomplish this one darling child. She was left in possession of a fortune, so that in a pecuniary point of view she was wholly independent of the friends with whom she resided.

James Gordon and wife set their hearts, on the first appearance of this beautiful girl into their family, upon an alliance between her and their favorite son. According to their English customs, they made this wish known to the young people, and at the time of Richard's entering the university, he was formally betrothed to Cousin Emma.

There was still another young girl, a year older than Emma, who now became a resident of the mansion, occupying the position of governess to the two little daughters, Lily and Fannie. She was highly accomplished, and in every way amply fitted for her important office, as companion and teacher to the children under her charge. She, too, was an orphan, but, unlike Cousin Emma, she was not an heiress. Her father was a clergyman, who, by dint of great industry had contrived to give his children a fine education, knowing that in case of his death they would be thrown upon their own resources as a means of support. Mary, the eldest daughter, had been bred under refining influences, and her tastes were early cultivated for art and poetry, and all delicate and womanly accomplishments. She sang and played the guitar most admirably, having inherited from both her parents a natural talent for music.

There was but little sympathy between Mary James and Cousin Emma. The latter was more interested in society and fashion than in books or nature. She was beautiful, and possessed those charming, graceful manners that rendered her a most attractive person, and consequently she drew admirers wherever she appeared.

Before Richard Gordon left home for the university, he had arranged for himself a studio, where he employed every leisure moment in his favorite employment. The apartment was in the upper story of the main building, and was fitted up with the most exquisite taste to suit the fastidious young man. Copies from the best artists hung about the walls, and statuettes, and the finest models of sculpture, occupied the recesses and niches of the room. Here the young student spent many of his happiest youthful hours.

During the college vacations, Richard was at home, and as he grew older, his love for art increased and became an absorbing passion. He now found a new enjoyment in his work, from the sympathy of Mary James, the young governess, whose pleasing ways and cultivated mind had gained for her the companionship of the members of the family.

The four years of college life passed rapidly away. It seemed like a dream to the young people. Richard had looked eagerly forward to its termination, for then he anticipated a return to his artist employments. Cousin Emma had looked forward to it with all a young girl's pride for her lover. She hoped that Richard would decide upon the law, and enter a profession that would raise him, if successfully practised, to a high niche in fame. There was still another, who, in the silence of her heart, looked forward to this happy time. She longed to have the young student at home again, to enjoy his artistic tastes, to sit in his studio and quietly watch his pencil fly over the canvass, bringing life and beauty out of nothingness. She loved to trace his bold imagination dash off the wild images that flitted through his brain. She wished him near her to consult on all subjects of taste and literature. It had been an era in her life when she had been admitted into the confidence of the young artist.

Had not Cousin Emma been so self-conscious of her own power to charm and sway the hearts of those around her, she must have felt a woman's jealousy for her powerful rival, Mary James. She had indeed the greatest reason to be so, but Emma could not understand how the simple girl of questionable beauty, and quiet, unassuming manners, could take precedence of her. She placed no great value on the poetic tastes of the young girl, and never for a moment supposed they could influence others more than herself.

Richard Gordon, now a young man of rare personal attractions, was proud of his beautiful betrothed, and if the thought of marriage ever crossed his mind at all, it was as the husband of the heiress. In the enjoyment of his congenial pursuits, he very seldom gave a thought to that far-off event, and it lay in his mind as a part of his family history, a poetic idea, that one day might or might not become a reality. He did not reason about it, or ask himself the question, whether or no he loved his fair betrothed. It had been arranged by his parents that he should marry her, and thus far he had seen no cause to rebel. In his gay moments, when his mind needed reaction from his engrossing duties, he sought the society of Cousin Emma; her gaiety and brilliancy came in well at such times, and pleased him.

Far different was the influence Mary James exercised over the young man. When his mind was filled with his art, when images of beauty were flooding his soul, and struggling to gain expression on canvass, then he sought the sympathy and refinement of Mary. He wished her by him when he sat in his studio absorbed in some new creation. She was his inspiration. Even her presence gave a new charm to his already brilliant works of imagination. From her face, he caught the light and shade that he wove into his work. Her grace suggested a new beauty to his figures, and if ever he was for a moment lost or undecided in the arrangement of his picture, Mary's instinctive love of beauty set him right.

In this way a year passed, and Richard Gordon was of age. This important era in the life of the young man wrought a great change in his character. Before this, he had naturally yielded to the will of others without arousing himself to question their authority. Now a strong, defiant spirit rose in his soul, and all at once he sprang up into a resolute man, that could no more be swayed by the mere will of others than the strong oak will bend to each summer breeze that sweeps through its branches. He was now of age. His parents and betrothed urged more strongly than ever their desire that he should throw aside his childish pursuits, and take some profession, and go out into the world to make for himself an honorable name among men.

This was the first great cause that Richard found for open rebellion to parental authority. He felt that he should never succeed out of his studio, and his hopes drew the most extravagant expectations for his advancement in this direction. He would go to Italy and study under the very shadow of the works of old and renowned artists. He would gain inspiration from the poetic influences of that golden clime. This was his dream, and woven in it was a still wilder scheme.

If Mary's quiet sympathy inspired him in his small efforts, how much more necessary would she be to his happiness and success as he rose in his upward path to fame. His whole soul was bound up in these two objects. Emma would only be a drawback to his life. Her beauty and accomplishments might gratify him, but he felt that they, too, might unconsciously draw him away from his beloved art. A life of hard, active labor was before him; he could not count on moments of leisure. His heart clung to Mary, and she seemed so connected with the past years of his growing experience that he could not imagine how life would seem bereft of her presence. For five years he had looked to her for encouragement and sympathy, and it had supported him, even with the whole family influence opposed to his pursuits.

With a manly pride, Richard made known his feelings to his parents, and met with resolute opposition. Their whole plans for their eldest and most gifted child were being set aside and treated with indifference by his headstrong will. They refused to give their consent to the union. But they mistook the spirit of Richard when they passed this stern decree. They did not anticipate rebellion. It came, nevertheless, but so quickly, that they were wholly unprepared for it.

Before the end of one month, Richard fled from his home, taking with him his beloved Mary, for the land of his boyish dreams. A letter left upon his writing-desk explained in a cool, manly way his reasons for taking the step, and his withdrawal to all claims upon the family inheritance, excepting what had already been settled by law upon him previously. This scanty income would bring the necessity of hard, indefatigable labor. He accepted this life for the sake of what he had gained by the exchange; he uttered no word of reproach or unkindness. In fact, the letter to his mother expressed all the tenderness that he had ever cherished for her. Even then, in his rebellion to parental authority, he was not unworthy his good heart.

This event was the breaking up of the family. With their notions of honor, they felt that lasting disgrace had fallen upon the house that bore their name. They were completely crushed by the blow. The name of the loved one was erased from the family record, and ceased to be a household word. In this way they disowned the son who had brought such calamity upon them; but in their hearts they loved him still, and mourned and wept over him as their lost, erring son.

The family continued to live here for some time after this event, but it ceased to be the cheerful, hospitable mansion of olden times. They discarded all sympathy, and shut themselves up in their seclusion to brood upon their troubles. Then all at once the house was deserted; the heavy shutters were closed, and the gray old building left to its gloomy shadows. Thus it remained for many years. The people, who were acquainted with the events I have related, had mostly passed away, and their children now occupied the places of trust then held by the parents.

One summer day the curiosity of the town was greatly excited by an arrival at the old ruined mansion. A lady of perhaps fifty-five years came, accompanied by a young and pretty girl, and took up their residence in this old building. The main part of the house remained closed, and was never opened, even to admit a stray sunbeam. This was the condition of affairs at the time our story opens.

Very little could be gathered of the history of the occupants of the old building. All that was at all definite was, that the elderly lady was not the mother of the young girl under her charge. She was an orphan child, whom the good woman had taken from feelings of charity at first, but had afterwards adopted from a strong attachment. She had given to the maiden her own home, and in all respects was she as an own daughter to her. It was said that the lady had never married. She was still a beautiful woman, though her face showed traces of suffering and mental struggle. She was wealthy, as every article about her person and household arrangements betokened.

Mira, the young girl, possessed a dreamy, romantic nature, and her tastes were gratified by living amid the ruins of this old English mansion. She would wander alone for hours among the dim shadows of the main building, exploring the empty, solitary rooms, and penetrating into the most secret recesses of the gloomy old ruins.

On one occasion, in wandering about the mansion, Mira ascended the upper staircase, that tottered under her tread, and passed along a dark hall, following a streak of light that seemed to come from a crevice under the door of some small apartment. Her heart almost failed her as she placed her hand upon the latch, for she fancied she heard near her the sound of low sobs, accompanied by a faint moan. She instantly retreated, and secreting herself in a dark corner, she awaited the solving of the mystery. As she stood there, almost breathless, she continued to hear stifled sobs, and the broken words of some human voice. Presently she heard a light footstep sounding from within the room. She awaited now with anxious fear the appearance of ghost or human being, as it might be.

After a short interval, the door of the apartment swung open, and a lady, pale, and with the traces of tears still on her eyelids, passed out of the room, and hurried down the staircase. Mira sprang forward a few steps to catch one more glance of the person who had flitted past her, and this look convinced her that it was her own guardian and adopted mother. What could be the meaning of this strange event? Mira did not suppose her parent had ever seen the old ruins until coming to live among them. What could be the associations connected with that one little room, that had the power to draw the beautiful woman into its shadowy gloom to weep and moan?

Mira's curiosity was too much excited to be checked now when at its height. Instinctively she pressed forward and entered the room that had been the scene of this strange drama. In an instant she found herself in the interior of an artist's studio. A faint light falling from the roof rendered objects half discernible. All about her lay fragments of paintings, some nearly completed, others just commenced, but all, save one, in a fragmentary state. The one that bore the marks of finished completion, was the face of a young girl. The dimness of the apartment gave a dreamy, spiritual light to the countenance, and Mira thought she had never seen anything so lovely before.

In a maze of wonder and delight, Mira sat down on a broken stool and gazed at this picture for many moments, unable to remove her eyes from the fascinating portrait. When she did withdraw them, it was to admire more works of beauty and art lying broken and half disfigured about the room. Here was indeed a mystery; her romantic tastes would have delighted in this dim studio, with its fragmentary ruins, as a daily retreat; but the thought of intruding upon the sanctity of another's grief might prevent a second visit to the mysterious apartment.

That night Mira lay in a wakeful state, and pondered the meaning of all this strange adventure. Weeks passed by, but she did not dare to gratify her curiosity by a second visit to this charmed spot. During this time she had been gaining some acquaintance with the walks and scenery about the town. She often took her pencil and sketch-book and wandered off on the hills, or in the woods, to take some one of the many fine views of the surrounding country.

On one of these excursions, Mira came suddenly upon a young man, to all appearances a stranger in those parts, who seemed to be engaged in the same employment as herself. He looked up from his work as the young girl passed down a path in the woods to gain an opening. Some movement of his arrested her attention, and she started in hurried surprise as she caught the eye of the fine looking stranger.

"Do not let me alarm you, lady," said the young man, rising from the bed of moss on which he had been reclining. "I see we are both engaged in the same employment. Let this be my excuse for addressing you. Will you allow me to look at your sketches?"

The courteous address of the stranger gained the confidence of Mira at once, and without any apologies or affectation, she placed her portfolio in his hand, claiming his in exchange.

"You have much fine scenery here from which to sketch. Look at this hasty outline I have just drawn, and tell me if you recognize it."

"Ah, that is very good—it is the old mansion where I dwell, with the hill and woodland back of it."

"Do you indeed live in this fine old castle? It reminds me of the buildings in my own land."

Mira looked up, surprised, and now noticed that the person before her bore the complexion of one reared under Italy's sun, although his accent was decidedly English. The stranger noticed her look of surprise, and said:

"I claim America as my original native land, for my parents spent their youth here on this soil, but Italy was my birth-place."

"You are an artist?" Mira ventured to say to the young man, as she continued to admire the outline she held in her hand.

"I hope to be one, lady, though I now dare not lay claim to that honorable title. I inherited a love of art from my parents. My father, I am not ashamed to call by the name of artist."

Mira wished to ask the stranger if he was stopping in their town, but feared to be deemed inquisitive; but her curiosity was soon gratified by the stranger himself, who informed her he was travelling for the purpose of improving his knowledge of landscape-sketching, and had been attracted by the romantic beauty of the scenery about this town and its surroundings, and had decided to spend a few months in the vicinity. They walked towards the mansion together, and their conversation turned mostly on painting and sketching. Mira had not very remarkable talent for art, but she had a delicate taste that had been but slightly cultivated, and she drew and sketched from nature simply for amusement, to fill up the long days with pleasant employment.

Now a new interest was excited in the mind of Mira for art in its high and beautiful relation to nature and life. A new revelation was being opened to her, and for the first time in her life did she begin to value aright what little talent she possessed. She felt the greatest desire to tell the stranger of the treasure she had found in the studio of the mansion. She knew the portrait was one of remarkable merit, and she longed to bring it out of its musty, shadowy retreat, to the admiration of the artist.

Mira thought to be very discreet, and keep the secret of the portrait in her own mind, but somehow, before she reached the mansion, it had escaped her lips. She reasoned to herself that it was too precious a relic to be kept out of sight, when here, before her, was a real artist, who might be able to trace its history, or at least be the means of bringing it to the knowledge of lovers of art.

The curiosity of the student was greatly excited, as we may judge, but he knew that it would be proper to first gain an acquaintance with the lady of the mansion before asking the privilege of examining the mysterious portrait; especially did he feel a delicacy in making a request, however much it might be to his advantage to do so, that seemed to be so painfully connected with the lady's happiness. It might awaken feelings in her mind that were too sacred to be probed, even by the hand of friendship; and as yet he was a stranger to her. He resolved to wait a more favorable time, and to restrain his curiosity.

Mira related to her guardian her meeting with the stranger, and requested permission to invite him to the house. The lady seemed interested in the recital and gave free consent. Soon the young Italian student was on terms of intimacy at the mansion. There was something in his looks and appearance that attracted the attention of the lady and elicited her confidence. She fancied she could trace resemblances that were so striking as to give her a painful pleasure in his presence, but usually she found delight and companionship in the society of the gifted young stranger.

On one occasion, when the artist called at the mansion to instruct Mira in some department of drawing, which he had been teaching her for a few weeks previous, the lady was absent, and a good opportunity seemed to offer for exploring the studio. Mira did not dare make the request of her protector, not knowing but some painful association might thereby be awakened, yet she felt an irresistible desire drawing her on to a closer examination of the beautiful portrait. The face, as she saw it in its dim, spiritual light had haunted her waking and sleeping hours.

Accordingly, they together ascended the old staircase, and passed through the dark hall, guided by the same faint light that had before attracted Mira's attention. On entering the studio, she perceived that some person had been there since her former visit, for the paintings had been differently arranged. The fragments of old statues and models had been carefully collected from the heaps of rubbish scattered throughout the apartment, and were arranged on shelves in an orderly manner. The paintings were leaning against the wall, all excepting the one portrait. She feared that this had been removed, but on further search, she found it, with its face draped in thin gauze, turned towards the wall, screened from the dust by many larger frames.

With an exclamation of joy, Mira drew out to the light the treasure of the studio, and held it up before the eye of the artist. A deathly pallor spread over his face, as he gave a quick look at the beautiful picture, and he cried :

"O, Heaven!—it is the face of my sainted mother!"

Mira was half stupefied by surprise and fear. What had she done? What mystery had she, by her curiosity, brought to light? Whom would it affect?—and what would come of it? All these thoughts passed through her mind, as the stranger stood in mute delight and homage before the image of his dead mother. Neither of them heard the soft footstep that was approaching through the long and gloomy hall.

In an instant the lady stood in the presence of the young artist and his companion. All three were struck dumb, and for a moment no one broke the silence. The stranger was the first to speak.

"Tell me, my good lady,—tell me the history of this portrait. I have a painful interest in asking it of you. It is the exact semblance of my dear, sainted mother—Mary Gordon."

The lady uttered a low cry, and fell fainting upon the floor.

"O, mother, dear mother, I have killed you!" cried the frantic Mira. "What can I do to bring her back to life? O, my mother, my mother!"

The blow of the fall had already partly restored the lady. In an instant she seemed to summon all the resolution of a strong nature to her aid, to bring herself to consciousness. In a low voice, she said :

"No, Mira, you have not harmed me. Help me to the drawing-room, and I will relieve my heart of its only secret. Perhaps it will beat more calmly when it has thrown off this one grief that has kept us apart and separated me from the whole world."

She then related to the young people the history of the family who formerly resided in the old mansion—the same that we have already given to the reader. Richard Gordon, the heir to that proud inheritance, was her betrothed lover. Within these walls she had lived and loved, suffered, and received the retribution that followed her ambitious pride, that scorned the idea of an artist husband. This was indeed Cousin Emma, the beautiful heiress, changed by sorrow and disappointment into the noble, self-denying woman.

When the lady had finished her story, she begged of the artist to give her a faithful account of his life and all that concerned his parents.

The young student was indeed proud to tell of the renown his father had gained as an artist in Italy. His pictures were already sought as models for young students; his name ranked with the proudest names in the catalogue of artistic fame. He spoke, too, with great tenderness of his poet mother, who had died but a few years before. She had been to her son what Emma knew she was in former times to her lover, inspiration in his art. Her love of beauty had been re-created in her son, and her last breath was devoted to encouragement and appreciative sympathy.

Thus after the lapse of a quarter of a century were the fragments of this broken family again brought together. Richard Gordon, on learning of the existence of Cousin Emma, crossed the ocean, to extend to her all the sympathy and affection she so much needed in her loneliness. They were the only surviving members of that once large family. Italy was the home of Richard Gordon. It was here he had commenced life and struggled on to a renowned manhood. Here he would spend his days, and live over again his youth in the hopes of his gifted son. After a sojourn of a year in the land of his birth, he returned to Italy, accompanied by his son and his young bride—Mira—and the dear good mother, who had been so faithful a guardian to the young girl she had reared unto womanhood.

Now, in a pleasant, luxurious home in sunny Italy, dwell in perfect peace and love the only remaining members of the family of Gordons, and in the artist's studio hangs the sacred portrait, and each heart cherishes it as a precious emblem of restored confidence and happiness. Even Cousin Emma now regards it with worshipful homage, feeling that if it once brought suffering to her soul, it has at length brought peace and restoration. It hangs there with its beautiful influence silently diffusing itself throughout that artist home, a part of its life, and an ever living, an ever inspiring joy.

TASTES.—We chew tobacco, the Hindoo takes to lime, while the Patagonian finds contentment "in a bit of guano." The children of this country delight in candy; those of Africa in rock salt. A Frenchman "goes his length" on fried frogs; an Esquimaux thinks a stewed candle the climax of dainties. The fancy dish of the South Sea Islanders is broiled clergymen, while they never get hold of a grass-colored umbrella without boiling it up for greens.—Traveller.

The Lacedæmonians applied their minds to no learning but what was useful; and would not suffer the professors of any speculative sciences to live in their government, lest by their disputations, and empty notions, they should deprave the true excellency of virtue.

"RUN OUT YOUR TONGUE, AND SHUT YOUR EYES."

BY JOHN THORNHERRY.

Old Dr. Jennings was a man
'Twould do your soul good once to meet;
So full was he of tenderness,
And yet of every odd conceit.
He had a way he called his own,
With all his patients, rich and poor;
For this no better was than that,
And all alike went through his door.

Among the host of sickly ones,
Eat up of spleen and sluggish bile,
That sought his aid from day to day,
Was an old lady, Mrs. Guile.
In truth, she was as well as he,
Or you, good reader, if not sick;
But she was rich, and that was why
Her ailments kept collecting thick.

The doctor could not go abroad,
No matter where, or how, or when,
But he was haunted with her face,
The wretchedest of wretched men.
He knew that hypo was the cause,—
He knew her illness was all made;
And he resolved at last to try
And put an end to such a trade.

One day she met him on the street,
On every side with people jammed;
She stopped, of course: she always stopped:
She coughed, and coughed; and he—he 'ham'd.'
"O, Dr. Jennings, sir!" said she,
"I feel so bad to-day, right here."
And put her hands across her chest,
And poured her troubles in his ear.

"Let's see!" the doctor gruffly spake;
"Run out your tongue, and shut your eyes!"
She did as she was bid; and he Passed on to some new enterprise.
For full three minutes thus she stood,
Exposed to everybody's jeers,
And woke at last to find herself
A fool among her lady peers!

She called upon him for his bill,
And never took another pill.

THE DREAM AT SEA.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

THE wealthy mercantile house of Carmer & Co. had given the charge of the good ship Albatross to Captain John Manvers, a perfect sailor, and a master whose many successful voyages had given him a reputation significant of good luck to all ventures under his control.

The wife of Captain Manvers, though an accomplished lady, and a woman of sound common sense in other matters, was a firm believer in dreams, not altogether without reason, she having experienced the fulfilment of many a dream, remarkable in itself, and more remarkable in its having been the prophecy of truth.

"Well, wife," said Captain Manvers at parting, "will my voyage be a prosperous one? What have you dreamed about it?"

"I know you smile incredulously, John," she said, "whenever I speak of my dreams coming to pass, and so often, I will not relate them to you, singular as my experience has been. At this time, for a wonder, I have no dream to speak of; but let me caution you—and I hope you will not think the warning a visionary one—against too much confidence in some of those foreigners whom you have enlisted in your crew. I have seen them, as you know, on board, and if there is a man among them all whom you should fear, it is your first mate, that dark-browed, mischievous-looking Luigi, the Portuguese. He looks like a pirate, and I believe that if he ever has a chance, he will be one."

"But the others?"

"Half a dozen of those swarthy countrymen of his, to me appeared like heartless and fierce-minded creatures, the very sight of whom made my blood curdle."

"Pooh! pooh!" exclaimed Captain Manvers, "you must not judge hard-working men by their exterior. Some of the best and bravest seamen I ever commanded have been ill-looking fellows—at least not calculated to please a lady's eye. They are all right enough, never fear. And don't let superstition make you so nervously suspicious."

"I rely so much upon my superstition, as you call it," replied the wife, gravely, "that I wish I had dreamed about your voyage; but let me propose this to you. For curiosity's sake, suppose that on the fourteenth day out, we recall this moment, and you give heed to the dream which you chance to have that night. And whatever it may be, receive it as an index of what is to follow, and be governed accordingly."

"Be it so," replied Captain Manvers. "I shall not be forgetful; but I promise you I sleep very soundly on the water, and it is as likely as not that I shall not dream at all."

The ship Albatross set sail, and was soon filling her white wings over the blue waters, bound to a tropical port.

The ship's crew numbered twenty, all told, and of these but seven were Americans, about as many, including Luigi, were Spanish or Portuguese, and the remainder English and Irish. The Spanish and Portuguese had shipped ostensibly for the purpose of a conveyance to the first port at which they were to touch, where they were to re-ship for home, if chance should offer, as was expected.

A few days after they had sailed, it was discovered that much of the stock of provisions was in such bad condition, that it was found necessary to put all on short allowance, and this caused no little discontent among a portion of the crew, making them very bellicose, particularly the Spaniards and Portuguese, to whom, the captain expected that Luigi had made false representations about the matter, as he gathered from their broken accents that they attributed the bad provision to meanness and design on the part of Captain Manvers. This dissatisfaction was shared by others of the crew, though not to so great an extent; yet there was such dissatisfaction evinced at mess, and when the men were about their work, that the captain's uneasiness daily grew greater. All he could do was to protest that he was innocent of any such intention, and to exhort them to be content with the misfortune.

But numbers of the crew shook their heads incredulously, and when they had an opportunity, conversed sulkily together in knots, or went about their work tardily and with ill-nature, often requiring orders to be several times repeated, before they would perform them.

Luigi, the captain remarked, seemed daily to be gaining ground in the favor of the men, most of them treating him with more respect than they did the captain; and Luigi himself took frequent occasion to exhibit to his superior officer signs of dislike, and disrespect for his authority; all of which, under the circumstances, the latter felt himself obliged to put up with, anxiously yearning for arrival at the port where he could get rid of so troublesome a set.

Before he was ten days out, Captain Manvers came to the conclusion that Luigi was the real master of the Albatross, and overmatched him in the good will of the crew; and this he attributed chiefly to the ill luck about the provisions; though the more familiarized he became with the first mate, the more he suspected that he was incessantly intriguing with the men, and the more he loathed the snake-like expression of his small, dark, sunken, glittering eye.

"My wife was right," thought he; "and never have I had such a vile set of fellows to deal with. But I will be wary with them, and strengthen myself as well as I can."

The fourteenth day came, and Captain Manvers remembered the proposal of his wife.

"Whatever I dream will bode no good, at least," mused he, "harassed as I am, night and day by these mongrels; and mayhap, however bad the dream may be, that it may prove true, as she suggested; for I expect but little good from this half of the voyage, as things stand."

As he thus reflected upon his unpleasant position, there was a noise of a scuffle upon deck, and he hastened thither to learn the cause. He there found Luigi in a struggle with one of the men, an Irishman, who, though Luigi was a powerful man, was about to get the advantage of him in the encounter, when the mate drew a dirk, which he was about to plunge into the sailor's side, which the captain prevented, by rushing in and seizing the blade with his naked hand, succeeding in wrenching it from the bloody-minded Portuguese, and flinging the weapon overboard; at this juncture his presence produced a cessation of hostilities.

"Howly Mary! Captain Manvers, ye did that very nately, long life to you!" panted the rescued seaman, as he leaned exhausted against the bulwarks, adjusting his torn shirt. "May I never sup soup, but I'll do as much for you, some of those days."

"What is all this trouble about?" inquired the captain, turning to Luigi, who was quivering with rage, his snake eyes glaring like a demon's. Luigi looked with intense hatred at the captain, and deigned no reply; while the Spaniards and Portuguese clamored in their peculiar gibberish, like so many crazy monkeys, for the refractory sailor to be put in irons, forthwith; one of them officiously bringing the "ruffles" to the spot.

"Avast there, John Portugee!" at this instant said an American sailor, stepping up between him and Captain Manvers, "or I'll shiver your top-lights in a jiffy! O'Rafferty's not to blame, your honor. The mate tripped over his foot, and struck him for his own awkwardness, and he resented it as it becomes a man for to do. You wouldn't iron him for that, captain, would you?"

"No, Peters, no, the man shall go free," replied the captain, looking proudly upon the listening mate, whose countrymen with the majority of the men, had ranged themselves together to watch the result. "If he did wrong in assaulting his officer, the wrong was offset by the drawing of a knife. It is a violation of my rules, for any one to carry a weapon about his person. Let me see no more of this wrangling, men," he added, turning to the throng gathered about Luigi. "There has been unnecessary trouble and disaffection enough already. I have marked it among you, and I wish to see no more of it. Be warned against ill advisers, men, or that may happen which you will bitterly repeat."

He walked away, overhearing the murmurs of that part of the crew who seemed inclined to side with Luigi, right or wrong.

"Cospetto!" hissed Luigi to those about him, as he ground his teeth at the double discomfiture, "worse will come of it, ere long!" And with a significant shrug and glance at O'Rafferty, who was now conversing with Peters, he held a low-toned interview with his companions, of no agreeable nature, judging from their looks and gestures. O'Rafferty caught the eye of Luigi, as its venomous glance was bent upon him for an instant.

"O niver mind, ye murderin blackguard. I fear neither yer ugly toad's eye nor yer knife, bad luck to it, that's to the bottom of the say, or will be soon. An O'Rafferty niver demeaned himself so far, as to take a knife upon his enemy. By the powers, if I had ye ashore, I'd—I'd—"

The sentence was unfinished, owing to the caution of Peters, who whispered to the irate Hibernian to keep cool and be on his guard; and during the rest of the day the affair was much dwelt upon by the men, who from that time took sides decisively, either for or against the captain, the majority being with Luigi—for they had been sounded by him often before, on a matter of darker import, and their piratical proclivities were found to be all that he could wish.

The fourteenth night had come, and Captain Manvers, as he retired to rest, knew that his wife was thinking of her promise; and musing upon her whimsical ideas of dreams, he fell asleep. He dreamed, and his dream was of no pleasant cast. In his sleep he saw afar off the shore to which they were hastening, and his heart beat joyfully as he thought how soon his difficulties were to cease. Suddenly the sky grew dark and the waters answered to the angry rumbling of the clouds. A storm was upon them! a tropical storm, and his men were ordered to their posts. They refused, Luigi demanding that first he should deliver up the command, or perish. Altercation ended in a quarrel. But few were faithful to him. They resisted. A bloody struggle ensued, himself encountering Luigi, and the villain's knife was raised to pierce his heart, just as a boat was leaving the ship with O'Rafferty in it.

With an herculean effort he strove to disengage himself, when—suddenly he awoke! Through the agony of his dream his brow was covered with perspiration, and his heart beat audibly. The light burned dimly, but with sufficient brightness to enable him to discover Luigi's figure stealing through the doorway.

"Who's there?" he cried, starting up.

There was no answer, but the door was slammed violently to. He sprang towards it and looked out, but nobody was to be seen.

"To thieve or murder, doubtless," he muttered, and trimming the lamp, he examined the pistols under his pillow. They were in order, and he determined, till they should reach their port, to keep them so, and carry them about him at all hours.

"She told me to be governed by the dream, whatever it might be, and I should be a fool to do otherwise, as I am situated. But I must do more. I must sound my men; and I think already I know whom I can trust—pity they should be so few!"

In pursuance of this resolution, that day he discovered, through the representations of O'Rafferty and Peters, who had not been unmindful of the actions of the others, that there were but eight in all, on whom he could rely.

He mentioned his dream, enjoining secrecy; and as if the vision had been a revelation from Heaven, preparations were made for the worst; first against surprise, and then for escape, should the faithful few be defeated. They were armed privately, and such weapons as they could not use were concealed in the hold of the ship. Things looked so menacingly that the captain decided for once in his life, to follow the counsel of a mere dream—but a dream enforced in impressiveness by dreary realities. Lashings were secretly prepared, and a boat so arranged, that, should a struggle come, and discomfiture await them, even in a storm, escape might not be wholly hopeless. These affairs concerted, they awaited the surmised event, of which none had any positive intimation.

For several days nothing unusual occurred on board the Albatross, and save the accustomed grumbling, dark looks, and reluctant labors of the Luigi party, no sign of mutiny was apparent on board.

One day, the breeze freshening into a gale, Luigi was speaking to the man at the wheel, in the hearing of the captain, in a boastful mood, how he had managed the tiller in a Mediterranean tempest, with no aid from a wheel or rope, steadying the swerving helm simply by his hand.

"Santa Maria!" said the helmsman, "not easy, Senor Luigi."

"Easy!" answered Luigi, scowling and looking darkly at the captain, "I could do it as easy—as I can fling Manvers into the sea!"

"Hist!" whispered the helmsman, in a serious tone.

The words were not lost upon the captain, who resolved, whatever might be his fate, not to allow himself to be a proof of Luigi's strength in such a feat.

Towards noon the gale increased, and the heavens became rapidly overcast, while the hot breath of an approaching storm made foamy and billowy the scared waters.

"Fulfilment!" reflected the captain, as he paced the deck, pale and agitated, while the mate was giving orders. "I now believe that dream. Thanks to its warning, if it prove the means of saving life, though mine be forfeited."

The tempest increased. Cautioning his chosen men to be on the alert, the captain gave certain orders about the reefing of the sails, when suddenly the suspected men mustered together and Luigi stepped forward:

"Why do you not do as I ordered?" demanded the captain, expecting an outbreak, his men prudently disposed near by.

"Because we demand that you surrender the ship to us, unconditionally," exclaimed the mate, "or—" and he drew a pistol—"you see life or land no more!"

"That for your demand, mutineer!" shouted the captain, instantly presenting a pistol, already cocked, which he had held behind him, and he fired. But the eye of Luigi was quick enough to forewarn him. He sprang aside and the ball entered the brain of one of his comrades, who fell dead upon the deck.

"Revenge! Blood for blood!" was the piratical cry of the fallen man's companions, and they sprang forward, half-astounded at this sudden anticipation of their project.

The precautions of the captain's party having left them unarmed, save, with here and there a dirk, they had thought to have overborne all resistance by mere main force, and to have cast all opponents into the sea.

As they leaped forward to their fiendish task Luigi fired at the captain, but only just as the latter closed with him, so that the aim was unsteady, and the bullet flew harmless through the crest of a wave.

"Boat! Rescue!" exclaimed the captain, as he grappled Luigi's throat, with the grasp of desperate indignation.

Half a dozen bullets responded to the cry of the captain, and sent three or four of Luigi's party, dead or disabled to the deck, so enhancing the surprise and dismay of the other mutineers, that they held aloof for a few moments, while the struggle between the captain and mate was going on.

Nor did the treacherous crew observe till too late, the activity of the supple O'Rafferty, who, with Peters, had quietly and quickly lowered the boat which had been fortunately prepared for this dream-foreboded exigency; and which, though it seemed scarce able to live in the heavy sea which threatened to engulf it, had been laid alongside before the manœuvre was understood by them.

The remainder of the captain's party, huddled at that point, were stoutly battling with their assailants, when a mighty sea fell like an avalanche upon the ship, with such almost annihilating force, that the mutineers were obliged to desist, to save themselves from being washed overboard. This timely wave, too, saved the captain's life; for blinding the gaze and making uncertain the foot of Luigi, whose dagger, even as the dream had foretold, was uplifted for the life of his adversary, it completely foiled his purpose, and he fell with an oath to the deck, the captain tumbling, drenched to the skin, upon him.

As soon as the vessel righted, Captain Manvers himself righted, and managed to plant a stunning blow under the ear of his not quite so active mate, from whom, by this expertness, he was released.

"Come, boat! boat!" now cried out O'Rafferty; "what's the good of a boat, ye spalpeens, if you don't get into it?" And indeed there was little prospect that the boat would be good at all, for anybody, for it was half full of water and in such a sea.

But no time was to be lost. The mutineers were on the point of a rally and a rush, but ere they had resolved upon it, their intended victims were beyond their reach, and pushing off, were soon tossing in their wooden shell, upon the uncertain ocean.

There was no attempt to guide or row her. Their reliance was only in the lashings which each had carried about his person, and with which they now fastened themselves to their frail bark; and upon the fact that they had converted it into a sort of life-boat, some days before, by means of tarred canvass, secured air-tight, beneath her seats. Thus, and with silent prayers to God, they trusted the heaving bosom of the deep.

As occasionally they disappeared in the trough of the sea, their late companions marked and mocked at them, thinking with the rise of every wave, to see them no more; but now the latter found work enough for themselves to do, for the dying and the dead were among them, they were short-handed, and the tempest grew fiercer and fiercer, and their terror-stricken hearts, made feebler by conscious guilt, made them despair of the help of Heaven.

And God helped them not. The frail boat of the faithful rode out the storm, and was borne to the coast in safety; and the strand, though foreign, was friendly, and they reached their homes once more; but for them, the mutineers, no such happy end was destined; their manageless, unmanageable ship—the ship they so coveted the control of, and for which they had been willing to pawn their souls—tossed on and on, each moment yielding to the avenging thunder strokes of old Ocean, till when at last they were hurled among giant fragments to the shore, they fell there mangled, but to die.

Their bones have long bleached upon the floor of that watery realm, over which they thought to have sailed, through many a bloody triumph, and to guilty pleasures and fortunes, their joy the terror of their helpless kind. But the survivors, whose fidelity received its reward, by the interposition of the all-potent arm of Heaven, still live to tell the story of that voyage, and teach their offspring to believe in dreams.

LOVING AND FORGIVING.

Man has an unfortunate readiness, in the evil hour after receiving an affront to draw together all the moon-spots on the other person into an outline of shadow, and a night-piece, and to transform a single deed into a whole life; and this only in order that he may thoroughly relish the pleasure of being angry. In love, he has fortunately the opposite faculty of crowding together all the light parts and rays of its object into one focus, by means of the burning glass of imagination, and letting its sun burn without its spots; but he too generally does this only when the beloved and often censured being is already beyond the skies. In order, however, that we do this sooner and oftener, we ought to act like Winckelmann, but only in another way. As he set aside a particular half hour of each day for the purpose of beholding and meditating on his too happy existence in Rome, so we ought daily or weekly to dedicate and sanctify a solitary hour for the purpose of summing up the virtues of our families, our wives, our children and our friends—and viewing them in this beautiful crowded assemblage of their good qualities. And, indeed, we should do so for this reason, that we may not forgive and love too late, when the beloved beings are already departed hence, and are beyond our reach.—Jean Paul Richter.

CHANTRY, THE SCULPTOR.

One day, when Chantry, the sculptor, had reached the height of his fame, and was paying a visit to Mr. Rodgers, at his residence overlooking the Green Park, he said, laying his hand on a pedestal, ornamented with a Grecian scroll—"Sir, do you remember a journeyman carver waiting, some years ago, in this room, to receive instructions respecting this identical stand, and the side-board at the other end of the room? I was that workman, then a journeyman, receiving 30s. a week."—Art and Artists.

The best way to discipline one's heart against scandal is to believe all stories to be false that ought not to be true.

THE FIRST LOCOMOTIVE.

In 1784, in Redruth, England, as a worthy pastor was returning from a visit to his flock, late in the twilight, he saw before him a strange nondescript, as large as a black ram, with eyes flashing fire, and breathing very hard, running furiously towards his shins. Providentially he sprang aside, and before his assailant could turn upon him, he had run such a distance as gave hope of deliverance, when he came full butt against a man running in the opposite direction. "Run for your life! back! back!" cries the parson. "Have you seen my steamer?" asked the stranger. "I've seen the evil spirit himself; run! run!" "By Jove!" exclaimed the stranger; "how far ahead is he?"

The tone of this question, and the company of a human creature, in some measure dispelled the fright of the faithful man, and assured him that he, if any one, should have courage to face the powers of darkness; so he turned and ran after the stranger, who, as he thought, by mistake had taken the wrong direction. They soon came up to the object of their pursuit, which had got into a ditch, and was roaring terrifically. To the astonishment of the parson, the stranger seized and dragged the fiery monster to the road.

"She got away from me, sir. I was giving her a try; the bit of road being good for a run." "O, goodness! well, she is yours, then. Pray, what is she?"

"A steamer, sir, I call her. She is a little experiment of mine, got up to try whether Mr. Watt's idea of running coaches by steam can be carried out. I think it can, sir, if capital can be got for it."

"Indeed! indeed! Pray, my dear sir, who may you be?"

"I am William Murdoch, at your service; a mechanical engineer, superintending the erection of pumping engines for Boulton & Watt, in the mines hereabouts."

Great was the relief and satisfaction of the worthy parson on discovering that what he imagined to be something broke loose from an unsafe place, was but a bit of honest mancraft—a lunatic conceit it might be, but harmless, except when it ran away, and might frighten children, perhaps hurt them.

This miniature engine was the first embodiment of the idea of locomotion on roads by steam.—Railroad Advocate.

EFFECTS OF TEA.

Dr. John Burdell, a distinguished dentist of New York, boiled down a pound of young hyson tea, from a quart to half a pint, and ten drops killed a rabbit three months old; and when boiled down to one gill, eight drops killed a cat of the same age in a few minutes! Think of it. Most persons who drink tea, use not less than a pound in three months; and yet a pound of hyson tea contains poison enough to kill, according to the above experiment, more than seventeen thousand rabbits, or nearly two hundred a day; and if boiled down to a gill, it contains poison enough to kill 10,860 cats in the same space of time! Dr. Burdell made similar trials with coffee and black tea, and found the results nearly the same.—Sunderland's Book of Health.

STANZAS.

Among the grassy groves, where all was calm and still,
I sat me down, and let thoughts come and go at will.
Dost see yon little mound, with the lily on its top,
Approach not carelessly, it is a hallowed spot;
A mother's first young bud of promise is laid there,
Whereon in star-lit hours she often drops a tear.

Here, too, at matin hours she's sometimes to be found,
And whispers many a prayer for the rosebud in the ground.
O weep not thou, young mother, thy darling is at rest,
Escaped from this bleak world to its Redeemer's breast;
Our Father took it home, away from suffering here,
He called it up to heaven, to be an angel there.

Then weep not, young mother, or weep for those still here;
Think of its happy state in yon celestial sphere.
I know tears give relief when the heart is much oppressed,
But we should mourn in faith that all is for the best;
You will meet your babe again in yon bright home above,
When you leave this dreary vale for the haven of joy and love.

J. F.

THE BANK BILL.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

THE night was far advanced—the sound of carriages and of foot passengers had ceased. I was slowly returning home, buried in the saddest reflections. I had exhausted my resources, wearied the good will of my friends; I had arrived at that degree of poverty which one conceals as a disgrace, and was returning in despair after a day of vain endeavors to improve my condition. I no longer hoped, except in a miracle. My head was cast down—my eyes fixed on vacancy. They were attracted by a little black object lying in the shadow of a building. I stooped. It was a pocket-book, about the size of a porte-monnaie. But a moment before, I had said to myself: "If I could only find a bank-bill!" and I had, for several minutes, sought minutely on the sidewalk, picking up all the bits of paper I perceived. I had quickly blushed for my folly, and recovered my senses. Now, it was precisely at this instant when I had been thinking so much of finding something that the idea did not appear absurd, that I held a pocket-book in my hand. It is impossible to imagine my sensations.

I had often reflected on an analogous situation, but I had formed but an imperfect idea of the emotion I then felt. I was overcome by a weakness which chilled my very marrow, a perspiration of the brow, a nervous tremor, dizziness of the head and violent palpitation of the heart. Reflection suddenly rendered me calm. I had so little faith in a fortunate chance, that I was convinced I should find in the pocket-book only insignificant paper. I put it in my pocket and continued my route.

I had taken but a few steps, when I saw in the distance, by the gas-light, a man coming towards me. Agitation disturbed my vision. It seemed to me as if this man was stooping to look for something. I am now persuaded that it was not so. But then the illusion was such, that I was overcome with fear. I suddenly imagined that this was the owner of the pocket-book, and that this pocket-book contained papers of importance. I will be sincere; a very dishonest sentiment spontaneously seized me. I turned and ran without knowing whither. In my confusion, there was a ringing in my ears, my breathing sounded like the bellows of a forge, which made me for a moment think myself pursued, and I felt almost sick. I suffered more than we suffer in nightmares in which we attempt to flee in spite of the inertia of our limbs. After a mad race through twenty streets, I at last reached my house and rang the bell. I rushed in and shut the door after me with feverish violence; there, I paused a moment to breathe. My limbs bent beneath me. I ascended the stairs to my room. The same reflection which had already calmed me, calmed me a second time. "I am mad, there is nothing in it," said I to myself. I entered my room more tranquil. I seated myself before a table and drew the pocket-book from my pocket. I noticed that, in spite of myself, my hands trembled as if suddenly attacked with the palsy.

It was a little pocket-book in shagreen, its color bottle green, and without a lock. Never did the most exciting romance awaken in me such lively interest. There were four pockets, of which one was closed by a clasp. I scarcely breathed. I emptied the three open pockets which contained, simply: First, a receipt for rent; second, two letters; third, a note for three hundred francs lent; fourth, a bit of court plaster; fifth, a piece of very old lace; sixth, the recipe for a cough medicine; seventh, the bill of an artist in hair. The closed pocket remained. I opened it, singularly cooled by the finding of the above-named articles. I was wrong, for I drew from it—and a powerful emotion like an electric shock seized me—a bill of a thousand francs!

O, what a sensation! I know not how long I remained in ecstasy before this little silken, veined paper, whose letters, M. I. L. L. E. F. R. A. N. C. S., flashed in my eyes like the blade of a razor. I scarcely thought that this bill might not belong to me. I was beside myself with joy. "A thousand francs! it is a fortune! it belongs to me!" An instant afterwards I doubted the legitimacy of my right, and suffered in proportion tised extortion and usury in an uncommon degree. So at least thought Madame Laure de G., since she did not hesitate to write to her thus :

"Your threats of speaking to my husband afflict me much, my dear Turpin, and are incomprehensible to me. You have too much good sense not to understand that you would do me an irreparable wrong, and that without profit to you. Restore to me my note, and I will give you another for three hundred and fifty francs, payable the 8th of next month. I can do no more. In case that be not sufficient, I will pledge you jewels enough to cover twice the sum. But do not threaten us with such miseries. You have not forgotten how much I was attached to you when you were housekeeper in my family? Be sure that I still love you much."

"LAURE DE G.

"10th April, 1850."

What else need I know? According to my system, I ought to believe myself really and truly the proprietor of the bill. And yet the conviction did not fill my mind in such a manner as to leave no room for doubt. There was a struggle which caused me at intervals a painful heaviness of heart. An instant afterwards, there was an ineffable, extravagant joy, to be comprehended only by him who has nothing, and who knows the value of money.

In order to enjoy my fortune in peace, I had to combine the intrigue of a long comedy. I might awaken suspicion by an increase of expenses, since I was known to be poor. I must live in the sight of my friends as I had been accustomed to do, in apparent poverty.

To change the bill, was not a little embarrassing. It was possible that M^{lle} Turpin might have communicated her loss to the prefect of the police, and that a description of the bill had been sent to the brokers. My exterior was far from betokening wealth. Would not he to whom I should apply to change my bill ask my name? Would he not follow me?—keep watch of me? What, then, should I do? I resolved to conceal the bill for some time and act with consummate prudence and discretion.

I had been in the habit of visiting a merchant who lived in one of the streets at right angles with the Rue St. Denis. Chance had brought among these people, more or less commercial in their habits, some artists and literati, so that there was quite a mixed society. I resolved to go there the same evening, with a view of procuring some details on the mode of changing money.

It was yet daylight. I had determined not to stop to read the handbills. It was in vain, for a yellow paper entered a corner of my eye and made me turn my head. "Lost." I trembled from head to foot, and read the handbill feverishly. It offered a reward of fifteen francs for the recovery of a lost parrot. Further on, a similar announcement struck my eye. This time, the subject was a greyhound. The emotion had not been the less disagreeable. I resolved not to turn my head again.

But here a voice which I could not silence made itself heard in my brain and said :

"What is the difference between what you meditate and theft? In algebraic style, to find and not to restore is equal to stealing. To find does not constitute a right any more than to take. If I had to make a distinction between you and a robber, it would certainly not be to your advantage. The robber uses, on occasion, cunning, address, boldness; he knows that he risks his liberty—sometimes his life; but you, you appropriate to yourself the property of others basely, without risk and without peril, having not even to fear the injury of a suspicion."

I replied, timidly :

"This woman is rich and avaricious; she has ten times more than enough for her subsistence. I have every reason to believe that she has not come honestly by this money—that she has stolen a part of it. Would it not be the height of absurdity for me to assume a disinterestedness so useless to her, so prejudicial to me, an unfortunate man, who knows not even how he is to subsist another day?"

"Pitiable reasoning! Theft is theft, whether it be committed on the poor or on the rich. Then, evil does not excuse evil. If this woman has been a thief, it is no reason you should be such. Restore the bill, or you will be all your life a miserable shadow of yourself, and never outlive your own contempt—more to be feared a thousand times than that of others."

By this time, I had reached my place of destination. I spoke just now of coincidences, and the stupefaction in which they always plunged me. I am about to state a new one which seemed to me miraculous. I had come with the intention of bringing on the carpet the subject of the changing of bills. There was present a gentleman, a cousin of the lady of the house, who was called Ernest. Until now, I had scarcely noticed the name. Suddenly this name, connected with an observation which he made on the head-dress of his cousin, caused me a singular sensation. This was the reason why: In the pocket-book, it will be remembered, was found among other things a hair dresser's bill; I had hastily glanced over it. It was the receipt for some hair valued at fifteen francs, furnished by a M. Ernest, artist in hair, Rue St. Denis.

past, I read the papers. I hoped thus to divert my attention. The first article which chanced to meet my eye was this :

"Yesterday afternoon, François, a hackney-coachman, found in his carriage a pocket-book containing valuable papers. He immediately carried it to the police office !"

What a lesson ! I threw aside the paper angrily. I took another ; but I was truly unfortunate. Chance seemed to persecute me. I did all I could not to read this other article, but vainly ; the characters would attract my eyes in spite of myself :

"A brave workman, whose name we hasten to publish, Joseph Pidoux, living at Rue Bourg l'Abbe, No. 6, found, Wednesday evening, on returning home, a pocket-book, which besides insignificant papers, contained two bank-bills—one of a hundred and the other of two hundred francs. The next morning, Pidoux went to report it to the loser. This act is the more praiseworthy, that Pidoux has a numerous family, and that he is at present out of work. Facts of this kind are not so rare that we need to be surprised at them. But we are glad to have them to record, were it only as a reply to the calumnies which are often uttered against our honest and laborious working population."

"But I have read a hundred such facts in the papers !" said I to myself. And I remembered a fact which had been related to me a week before concerning a poor young girl who, like myself, had found at midnight on the sidewalk a pocket-book containing a thousand francs, which she had unhesitatingly restored to the owner, refusing even the reward which had been offered. All these examples distracted my mind and inspired me with a profound contempt for myself. I should not have waited a second longer. I should have risen, taken the pocket-book, and hastened to return it. I resolved to wait until the morrow. Decidedly I was a wretch.

I paid by cruel nightmares this last effort of my vicious inclinations. But I had had enough of them. I put the pocket-book in my pocket, after having made a memorandum of the papers it contained and copied the two letters, for I wished to punish myself by one day confessing publicly my guilt, and I went to the Passage Verdeau, where I easily found Mlle Turpin. This old woman examined me suspiciously. I told her why I came. She seized the pocket-book and opened it with feverish vivacity. Once certain that nothing had been subtracted from it, she looked at me insolently and said : "You have been a long time in bringing it to me."

The reproach fell so heavily, that I blushed to the white of my eyes. My confusion and my embarrassed countenance induced her to believe that I expected the reward she had promised in handbills.

"Ho !" grunted she ; "fifty francs for the trouble of stooping !"

I recovered myself immediately. I turned my back upon the old woman and went out without even taking leave of her.

We recoil before an act of probity, for fear of suffering, almost as we hesitate to have a tooth extracted ; but, in both cases, as soon as the thing is done, we feel a profound—an ineffable satisfaction. This was my case. On leaving, notwithstanding a remnant of bitter sadness, I felt more at ease and praised myself for my act. I dare affirm that there was but little merit in it. Of what use had been my reason, my intelligence, the education which had been given me, the books I had read ? The clearest result of this intellectual development had been to reduce me to a problematic honesty, incontestably below that of a hackney-coachman and a poor girl.

At least, I ought to congratulate myself on this adventure, since, dating from that day, I was radically cured of that deplorable affection, common to so many unfortunates, which consists in a passionate desire to find something. What I endured during three days of possession, more than sufficed to ensure my virtue in the future.

A CHARACTER.

"Old Bumblebee" gained the title from the fact of his catching a bumblebee one day as he was shingling his barn, and in attempting to destroy the insect with his hatchet, cut off the ends of his thumb and forefinger, letting the insect go unharmed. Other mishaps happened to the same old codger in the same barn. In one of his abstractions he shingled over his spare hatchet ; and cutting a small aperture in the building to let a little daylight in, this man actually set in a wooden pane as being economical and not likely to be broken ! Uncle T., in one of his oblivious freaks, nailed his left arm so firmly betwixt two boards of a fence he was putting up, that he had to call help to get extricated from his self-imprisonment. He once put a button on the gate instead of the post. But the rarest freak of all was when he ran through the streets with his hands, about three feet asunder, held before him, begging the passers-by not to disturb him, as he had got the measure of a doorway with him.—Newburyport Herald.

PRECAUTION AGAINST POISON.—In Germany, to prevent poison being obtained for evil purposes, none is allowed to be sold without a written order or certificate from a physician. To prevent rat poison being made bad use of, or taken by mistake, the arsenic is mixed with tallow and lamp black, which makes a compound that no human being could partake of.

TO S. ANNE.

BY R. G. VAN PELT.

I think of thee when morn's first light
Breaks o'er the earth and sea;
When sunset's crimson dies at night,
My thoughts are all for thee.

My thoughts are thine mid toil and strife,
And all life's pleasures free,
Are thine, forever thine; my heart
Throbs only, love, for thee.

My thoughts are thine from morn till night,
Wherever I may be;
And should I never see thee more,
I'll always think of thee.

Now if this love prove mutual love,
It would be wrong to sever;
For love like mine, both true and kind,
Can never perish—never!

VASCO DE GAMA.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

AT the close of the fifteenth century, Genoa, once queen of the Indian commerce, was fast losing her supremacy, owing to the discoveries of the Portuguese in the Southern Ocean, and the transfer of trade by them to the cities on the coast of the North Sea. Thus Diaz, the discoverer of the southern point of Africa, was held up to the execration of the Genoese, and when Malabar was taken possession of, none but those who have experienced that hatred, most intense when kindled by avarice, can imagine the curses showered on the illustrious name of Vasco de Gama. Most virulent and yet most silent of the Genoese in abuse, was the rich, old merchant, Marino di Vinci, who, pulling down a close, black velvet cap over his silver-gray locks, would concentrate a whole tornado of rough-rolled r's into one word, and stalk angrily off; but that one word was an oration. Yet a populace seldom look at the specifics, and while macaroni was plenty, this people thought nothing of the future, and felt but little the decline of their national grandeur.

The dwelling of the old merchant was built up on the very wharves; ware-house after ware-house (and some of them now closed and empty, so that every time he passed them he gnashed his teeth,) extended along, ending in a solid, stone erection, whose roots were washed by the bay, and whose narrow windows were frequently wet with the spray. Behind and on each side, the constant hubbub of commerce blithely clashed, but before it lay only the bay, with boundless waters flecked with white sails, and one long point of land running out cool and green into the sea.

Here, nourished from her childhood with no affluence of affection, for he had not loved her mother, had grown up into girlhood and beauty, his only child, Leonora. Her mother was from the hated northern climes—could he love too fondly the child whose loveliness combined the excellencies of both races, whose golden tresses and fair, lustrous skin of the North showed no less splendid than the dark, radiant eyes and haughty features of the South?

The Signor Marino di Vinci had that day completed a negotiation (through the agency of a foreigner to be sure, but, as he confessed, well-bred and noble,) which had enriched him many a scudi. His heart being warmed into a not unusual liberality, he pressed the stranger to receive his hospitality during his stay in Genoa. And thus with his guest he entered the light and lofty apartment looking out on the sea, where sat his daughter, and not thinking to present him, having indeed only imperfectly heard his name, he passed out for a moment.

A year before, Leonora had spent with an aunt in Spain, and it could hardly be supposed that a young girl should be so indifferent, as she had appeared, to all the lusters who waved their perfumed love-locks under her lattice, unless one more successful had forestalled them. Be that as it may, she kept her own counsel, and if she treasured one form, one glance in secret, or trembled when her father rolled his r's over one name, no one perceived it, and she was still, for all that the world, save one, knew, as free as air.

Now, as the stranger entered, Leonora glanced up a moment and then glanced down, but in the two different glances volumes might be interpreted. The stranger had risen from his seat and approached her broidery frame; gently placing his hand before her work, he drew her head back, and kissed the smooth, white forehead.

"And thou, Leonora!" he said, in Portuguese.

She sprang up, returned his kiss with a quick fervor, and then, glowing all over with joy and shame, as quickly turned away.

"No more, Leonora?"

But she held up her needle threateningly and resumed her seat; the stranger had just time to follow her example when the door opened and the old merchant again entered.

"Ah, I see, signor," said he, "that you and my daughter have already made recognition," and he plunged at once into a lively conversation with the handsome stranger, which the height of this part of the building above the adjacent noises made easy and pleasant, till luncheon entered. Doing the honors of her father's table with a graceful ease, Leonora listened enchanted to the wonderful tales of travel that poured from the guest's lips, as skilfully elicited by the polite and interested Signor di Vinci. There was nothing egotistical in the recital of these adventures; indeed, all the stranger told was clothed with so great modesty and quiet dignity, as to leave the impression that the half was not heard.

"Let me offer you this candied fruit, signor," said the merchant; "poor stuff, to have eaten the fruits of all climes just plucked from the bough, but invaluable here. See what a golden light is in the purple syrup! Think you the ambrosia was of more delicious perfume?"

"Not to be named with it!" answered the stranger, as seriously as his host. "It is besides peculiarly pleasant to me, as being the first produce of Asia that ever passed my lips."

"How so, may I ask?" pressed di Vinci.

"Ah, on an endless voyage, doubling the cape for the first time, on that day most sacred in the annals of Portugal, when taking possession of Malabar—"

"Malabar!" cried the merchant, his eyes sparkling over his angrily contracted face; "Portugal? You were then with that accursed Vasco de Gama?"

"Signor," said the stranger, rising and leaning one hand on his chair, "I am Vasco de Gama."

The amazement of the old man filled the room with a protracted silence. At last, without looking up, he breathed a deep sigh.

"And I have broken bread with you!" he said, between his teeth.

"And whom has it injured?"

"Me! Me and my people! Your expeditions have torn life by the bleeding roots from Genoa."

"It is in my power to restore what I took."

The old man looked keenly and craftily up.

"Ha!" said he, "such great things were never offered without reason. Not without an object did you put that barter in my hands this morning. I was a fool to believe in a disinterested man, and he of all others, a Portuguese. I see now! My pretty half-breed there has not lived a twelve-month on the Spanish frontier for naught. So we did not finish the bargain this morning. I must now perform my share. Well, signor, you want my daughter?"

If Vasco de Gama could have quailed, it would have been beneath the scorching glances of the merchant, but only drawing himself to his full height, he returned:

"I do. Will you give her to me?"

The old man laughed.

"Will you build up Genoa?"

"It were impossible."

"Ignoble boaster! Not a moment since you said you could restore her life."

"I said I could restore what I took. The argosies whose prows I turned northward I can turn again to the gulf of Genoa; but who will receive their costly bales of Arabian spices, Indian stuffs, Asian jewels? Who will load them with fresh merchandize, who steer them out of the dangerous Straits, who sell their freights left behind? You, Signor di Vinci, and some half-score others! But where are the thousands who made the grass-grown Rialto a swarming mart? Signor! my hulls would rot in your harbors. I could, I repeat, bring back what I took away, but what nature first took away—never! Your Genoese are rotting in idleness, blistering their souls out on hot pavements; they have neither energy, learning, skill nor strength; far rather begging or stealing than earning. Signor, people, not circumstances, make a place what it is. The trade left your ports because your people were so miserable. Hardy northern air and bracing industry came out to meet it, sailing into Antwerp and sister cities. I, as a Southerner, should have been glad to retain it in the Mediterranean, even despite the dangers of the Straits."

The old man's rage quivered in him till the table, on which he leaned, shook.

"Well, Signor Vasco de Gama," he replied, with a calm voice, nevertheless, "you shall not have my daughter! Now go your ways, sirrah! If in Genoa an hour from now, you shall swing higher than Haman!"

"My craft is at your walls, signor," returned his guest, "and it will not sail till the evening wind rises, some seven or eight hours hence. Be assured I shall not leave Genoa till then, or till I choose!" And kissing the hand of Leonora before her enraged father's eyes, he bowed himself out of the room.

Long they sat there, father and daughter, in the stately dining-hall; he with his head bowed in his hands. A servant entered with a dish of plums, whence Leonora adroitly drew a strip of written paper, from her lover.

A long, long time they sat there confronting each other, till the sunset reddened and darkened, and twilight began. The song of the stirring sailors without became audible—the rising wind rustling round the corners of the stone masonry, like a fine lady flirting her silks—the ordering tones of the officers—the weighing of the anchors below. The tall masts raked across the narrow windows; the vessel stood out to sea. And all this time despair was settling on Leonora's heart.

neath. Slipping from beneath her tent, Leonora stole softly forth and wandered round at no great distance. The stillness enchanted her, as step by step she increased the space between herself and the caravan, watching the unknown stars of a southern hemisphere, now going back in her thoughts to the primeval times when all men dwelt in tents, and now wondering whither de Gama bent his conquering sail. At last, tired of this as of everything else, she turned; the tents were nowhere to be seen. Everything had vanished like a dream, and new sandhills with their fantastic phantasmagoria, white, deceptive and supernatural in the moonlight, shut her in, and excluded the little yellow flame of the fire over which she had left the foreheads of the dark Bedouins shining. There was no point by which to direct her course; she could tell neither north nor south; to advance either way might be equally dangerous. She called aloud; her voice fell dead and echoless in the silence; they would think it some jackall howling over a dead beast. She called again; better her father's caravan, hateful as it was, than this. Lost in the desert. Dreadful fate! They could not be at a great distance, but as well be in that new, western world.

At last, fixing a point in a large, red star before her, she climbed one of the little sandhills and gazed in that direction—all was vacant,—level expanses of desert and scattered groupings of mounds. Turning, she sought an opposite hill, taking care that this time the star should be behind her—all as before; in the other two directions, now, the star at the left on one, at the right on the other. Hope kindled in her bosom, she could not doubt of success, and ran forward gaily. Suddenly a low, half whistle struck her listening ear, the blow of a hoof almost smothered in sand, and leaping between the hills, a small, sinewy horse sprang down, whose Arab rider spurred him close beside her, and all in a flash, had placed his hands on her waist, swung her into the saddle, with a soft-toned Arabic exclamation, and was dashing through the desert again while holding her in a close grasp. At last, in answer to all her angry and vehement expostulations and entreaties, as she wrung her hands believing he could not understand her:

"Patience, lady, I implore," said he, in excellent Italian. "Cries are as unavailing as threats. Can you see me in the starlight? Confess that I am young and comely, that I am strong and brave. For what did I sail up the Nile with the white lily of Genoa? for what track her course three days—but to win her? Be silent! Sheikh Hassan has a right to the fairest bride that lives!"

"You do not wish," said Leonora, thinking the gentlest course the best, "to make another man's wife, yours? Besides it is not lawful."

"Law!" he quoted. "What is law to me who am freer than air? And thou art no one's wife?"

"You are mistaken. I was married almost three weeks since at Palermo."

"Who is your husband?"

"Vasco de Gama."

"Are you jesting?"

"I am speaking the truth."

The Arab was silent. Still they rushed across the desert. At last, "It will make no difference," he said, lightly, "you are mine now."

"You do not dare," began Leonora.

"Ah, if you put it on my daring, lady—I dare anything."

"My husband will reward you for me nobly."

"Am I like other Arab chiefs, to be bought and sold? Thy husband is bound for Goa now by this time, I think?"

"How do you know?"

"Do you suppose I do not mark the course of my greatest enemy?"

"Enemy?" said she, looking up wonderingly.

"Ay, enemy! Truly I count him so, who, displacing our camels with his white-winged ships, turns the burdens that once they bore, into other routes, and robs our people of their heritage and occupation! And if not that indeed, is he not mine enemy who possesses what I covet? You, lady?"

"If you wish for my love, you woo in an odd way."

"The deserts are full of Arab women pining for love of me; it were singular could I not gain the love of one simple girl from Genoa."

"You cannot," answered Leonora, with a calm smile of confident hope.

An hour passed and no more words were spoken on either side during that time, till at last the silence was broken by Sheikh Hassan.

"Listen, lady. Goa is thousands of weary, desert miles away from us; thousands of weary, salt sea miles away from de Gama. We shall be there first by many days. Yet I will take thee there and await him. If he takes the city, I battling on the walls, thou art his; if he falls, mine! Such as thou art, are worth fighting for! And till then be no man's wife. I give thee freedom, which thou didst not have when I found thee!" And true to his plighted word the Arab placed her in a family of women and continued with them their ceaseless wanderings, slowly and slower approaching the south pole, till six months were over; then crossing the Himalah, SOLILOQUY OF MAJOR ANDRE.

BY MILDRED MONTROSE.

And must I die in early youth?
 While life looks bright and fair to me?
 To perish far from childhood's scenes,
 Alone upon a gallows-tree?
 And was it then for this I left
 The comforts of my happy home,
 And parted from those friends beloved,
 For whose dear sakes I wished to roam?

My mother, in thy calm dark eye
 How many bitter tears would swell,
 Couldst thou but know the fate to-night,
 Of one whom thou hast loved so well;
 To me thou breath'dst in childhood's days,
 Of hopes that death could not destroy;
 Those teachings, mother, now shall be
 The comforts of your dying boy.

My sister, in this trying hour
 My memory swift will fly to thee;
 Perchance within thy rustic bower
 Thy prayers arise to Heaven for me;
 But ere to-morrow's autumn sun
 Shall gild the sparkling western wave,
 His fading light shall fall upon
 Thy brother's lone, dishonored grave.

But there is one, my heart will shrink
 From bidding thee, beloved, farewell;
 Too well I know what bitter pangs
 Within that gentle heart will dwell.
 The brilliant dream of fame and love,
 For me, alas, must now be o'er;
 My life's short path would brighter be,
 Could I but clasp that form once more.

It may not be—I now must bid
 To friends, to hope, to love adieu;
 For death comes on with sweeping wing,
 And shuts the future from my view.
 Ambition's hopes must now be crushed,
 Within my heart they cannot dwell;
 My thoughts are of long-cherished friends—
 Once more a long and last farewell.

THE HAUNTED BRIG.

BY R. LINTON WEATHERBB.

It was an autumn evening. The dead leaves were falling about the garden, and all was still save the noise of the flood lapping the sea-weed on the shore. Two persons were walking beneath the old trees in the garden, one was a young man in whom was exhibited somewhat of the mien of a sailor, though scarce twenty summers had broadened his shoulders, and though a foreign sun had browned his cheek, yet he was "full of lusty life." Upon his arm leaned a lovely, laughing creature, just bursting into glorious womanhood; her eye sparkled with the fires of wit and mischief; she seemed one who could laugh at every disappointment, and by whom to be beloved was bliss. Silver-toned words were dropping from her rosy lips. She gaily reproved him of the broad shoulders at her side.

"Do you sail so soon then? How naughty, Rupert. I shall be getting jealous of Mistress Ocean. You have scarcely arrived, and now you are anxious to go. Mayhap some pretty one of the luxuriant South calls you from your cold maiden of the North. Ha! methinks that brown cheek waxes a little brighter at the accusation. O, you naughty, naughty boy! Remain a few days longer and attend our picnic. I shall be alone without my manly Rupert. Come, say you will."

"Were it possible, Clara, I would, but I must sail. I should have been away three days ago, but for those superstitious fellows who have got an idea that the vessel is haunted. And now they will not sail without I stay to-night in the fore-castle and unravel the mystery for them. If I succeed in shaming them, we are to sail to-morrow. The whole village is astir with their foolish stories."

"You don't believe in ghosts, then?"

"Nor does Clara, I presume."

"I believe in ghosts, the evil spirits which haunt the vessel of Rupert Lyons and in—"

"Good night, Clara." And Rupert walked towards the wharf.

The scene was on the banks of one of those quiet little harbors, where merchants sometimes grow silently rich, away from the noise and smoke of the crowded city. It was in Prince Edward's Island, a good many years ago, when commerce was an infant there. I was a young man then, and had charge of a small brig sailing to the South. We had just completed taking in a cargo for New Orleans, and intended trading among the West India Islands until spring should unlock the harbors of my fatherland, which winter always fastened with strong bars of ice. My employer was the principal merchant of the place, and lived near the wharf. We were distantly related by marriage, but a near tie of friendship bound us closer than blood. Perhaps that tie was Clara Sea, perhaps it was; at any rate I had always lived with him previous to going to sea, and now, when in port, spent all my leisure hours at their pleasant home; there was Rupert's room still, and Rupert's slippers, and his writing-desk, and his rifle, and his dog.

I was passionately fond of the sea, and being scarce out of my teens, the acme of my ambition was to make shorter stays and quicker voyages than any other vessel; and now that I had a share in the business, private interest supplied to ambition what it might be losing of youthful enthusiasm. Upon the whole I am afraid I was but a sorry lover, and my coldness and neglect were sufficient incentives to awaken the witty sarcasms of the pretty Clara, which were always joined by the jovial laugh of old Mr. Sea.

According to the statements of the crew, the brig had been haunted for several nights previous to the completing of her load, by nocturnal visits; and these still continued to be kept up. One had seen a small, whitish figure jump from the wharf, hop quickly across the deck and leap into the water; another had seen two figures passing quickly around the shed on the wharf and all had heard loud reports at midnight, as of the explosion of a gun upon the deck. The combination of these strange events had so terrified the superstitious sailors, that many of them refused to sail until I should convince them by other means than words that they were laboring under a delusion. And now, when three days were gone, and their lively imaginations were enlarging everything tenfold, I determined to watch one night and weigh anchor on the morrow; and for that purpose, on the evening alluded to, after taking a hasty leave of Clara, I proceeded in the direction of the vessel. The long wharf was deserted by all the craft, and not a spar arose above the wharf save those of our little brig which lay moored at the further end. Two small schooners had just moved into the channel, and were awaiting a more favorable wind. The night was growing rather dark, but disturbed only by soft zephyrs which sighed softly in the rigging. Having arrived at the outer block, and before going on board I made a review of the place. Near the bow of the vessel and opening in the other direction, was a shed or storehouse, erected on the wharf, for convenience in loading and unloading. Entering and casting a searching glance around the interior, I satisfied myself that no one was there concealed. Barrels and boxes were piled against its walls. In this corner was heaped a lot of large turnips, in that were arranged ears, and spare yards, and oyster-tongs, and in the centre were several heavy anchors and two or three superannuated, heavy guns. Leaving this and stepping on board I found the men in a feverish state of excitement.

I endeavored to shame them out of their fears by laughing at what I termed their folly, upon which they promised that if I watched in the fore-castle, where they deemed the most danger was to be encountered, and if I could explain the mysterious visitation to their satisfaction, they would sail the next day. Taking with me two of the most timid, and sending the rest to the cabin, I went below, and stretching myself on a sea-chest, was sinking into a deep slumber, when a noise, as of something falling on deck, brought me to my feet, and immediately a rolling sound was heard followed by a sudden plash as of something falling overboard; this was repeated thrice at intervals of about a minute, each time, however, increasing in loudness, when all was hushed. Taking advantage of the pause, I directed my two men upon no account to make a disturbance, unless I called, and went on deck.

After searching everywhere, and putting my ear down to listen, until completely tired out, I wrapped myself up in a foresail and awaited in curious anxiety. Remaining half an hour without any signs of a repetition, I again went below and prepared to sleep. I had barely time to get comfortably stretched, when, as I had just begun to doze, a noise, louder, heavier and more terrible than any preceding one, brought my timid companions trembling to my side; but, unlike the former, it did not extend beyond the deck, no rumbling over head, no splash of water was heard, it ended as if something had been crushed to atoms where it fell; then followed the same gentle, lulling sound of the water upon the vessel's prow, the same gentle breeze was heard moaning in the rigging, and the dread silence of the fore-castle was broken only by the loud heart-beats of my superstitious attendants.

I crawled noiselessly from below, and hearing a slight rustling in the direction of the shed, I passed over the bow and moved softly round to listen. On arriving at the opening in front I looked cautiously in, and what was my surprise to see a figure approach from the further corner, with something held in what appeared to be an outstretched arm. It moved slowly and guardedly towards the spot where I stood concealed by a large box. Quick as lightning the truth flashed across my mind. I closely scrutinized the object. It was held by a small, gloved hand, which was now near my face, and lo, it was a huge turnip! The figure placed itself in an attitude as if to throw it with more than ordinary strength, when I stepped forward and there fell into my arms the form of Clara Sea. Another slight report might have been heard, and the ghost would trouble us no more. I waited till the day of the picnic, and the one following—and another, and another—until the old man began to go oftener than usual on the wharf, and then sailed out of port, perhaps not so enthusiastic a sailor, but a more devoted lover. Clara's artifice, if it did not frighten us into giving up the voyage, hastened a marriage ceremony!

IMPROMPTU.

CONSOLATION TO A SUNBURNT BEAUTY.

BY FRANK FRELOVE.

Who votes the salute of Apollo a blemish?

The god of the lyre stoops admiringly down,
From the wine of thy cheek his own bloom to replenish—
Repay ye the kiss of a god with a frown?

Who votes the salute of Apollo a blemish—

Precariously seized 'neath a straw-plaited shade?
Of all things in Cupidom slightly coquettish,
Is a straw-plaited gipsie on sparkling-eyed maid!

Who votes the salute of Apollo a blemish?

What though in his warmth he thy crimson embrown?
The sun-god the fount of thy life shall replenish:
Then, beauty, meet thou not his kiss with a frown.

THE DUELLO.

A TALE OF LOVE AND CHIVALRY.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

It was a lovely, warm and yellow afternoon of the pleasant Indian summer season, that the subject of the present memoir, with love in his heart, and his best coat on his back, stood before the mirror in his room at the hotel, giving the finishing touches to his toilet, preparatory to a call upon that ever-so-much-too-pretty-to-be-described young lady, Miss Mary Jones. And as he stood gazing complacently at the fascinating image reflected in the glass, giving divers and sundry twitches to his dickey, and pokes of the fingers to his carefully arranged locks, while he practised a killing smile, and pictured to himself with a decidedly pleasant sensation how pretty little Mary's heart must bound and flutter when approached by such a noble specimen of humanity, he was startled by a loud rap at the door.

"Come in," he ejaculated, rather sharply; for he was none too well pleased at being interrupted in his pleasant occupations; "come in."

The immediate and very natural effect of this peremptory summons was the opening of the door and the entrance of a tall, stout-built gentleman in riding boots and spurs, and with a profusion of bushy, yellow whiskers—or rather mane—which imparted to his glowing countenance that safe and winning expression which characterizes a first class Nubian lion of the male sex. This pleasant apparition having deliberately closed the doors behind him, advanced into the room, and placing his hat and gloves upon the table, drew himself up to his full height, with the interrogatory:

"Mr. Jinx, I believe?"

"I have the honor to bear that name, sir," I replied, motioning him to be seated.

"I thank you—no, sir," he returned, with a magnificent wave of the hand and a military "ahem!" of the most appalling dimensions, at the same time drawing a letter from his pocket and extending it towards me. "I have the honor to be the bearer of a communication from my honorable friend, Bellerophon Smithers, Esq."

"Bellerophon Smithers!" I exclaimed, with a start, and the least little bit of a tremor in my voice; "Bellerophon Smithers!"

"Bellerophon Smithers."

"O—ah—yes—exactly; that is to say—precisely," I muttered, taking the letter and turning my back upon him, that he might not observe my confusion.

Removing the envelope from the missive, I enjoyed the ecstatic pleasure of reading the following delightful production:

"MR. A. JINX,—SIR:—Immediately upon receiving this message from the hands of my friend, Captain Fitz Battleaxe, you will inform him when, within the period of twenty-four hours, and at what place, within a circuit of five miles, you will meet me for the purpose of giving me that satisfaction every gentleman has a right to demand.

"Sir, let there be no cowardly apology or evasion—I shall admit of neither. In case your answer is not immediate and to the purpose, I shall give myself the pleasure of calling upon you with a cowhide; after administering which, you will be fitted with that garment which gentlemen of this vicinity consider the proper dress of a coward, to wit—tar and feathers; a dress, by the way, which, in my opinion, will not be altogether new to you.

"BELLEROPHON SMITHERS.

"P. S.—I have further to inform you that there will be no occasion for you to call in the interim upon Miss Mary Jones, to whom both your attentions and yourself are as disgusting as you are contemptible in the eyes of everybody else. B. S."

"So," I exclaimed, turning towards Captain Fitz Battleaxe, with all the ferocity of manner I could assume at short notice; "so Mr. Smithers expects me to fight him, does he?"

"I incline to the opinion that my friend intends to compel you to fight him," returned the captain, pompously.

"Compel me to fight him!" I roared, in a voice of such tremendous power that the word "compel" ought of right to be here printed in that species of type which is used in announcing the name of a theatrical star on a placard. "Compel me, sir—rrr! I'd have you to know that it is I who will compel him. Yes, sir, I'd have you to know that I'm absolutely thirsting for that snub-nosed puppy's blood! But I beg

"But, I say, captain—Captain Fitz Battleaxe!" I exclaimed, rushing after him, and singing out down the stairway: "please represent to your friend that it will be unnecessary for him to order breakfast, or anything of that sort, to come off after our meeting, as it will only be a useless expense and give his administrators the trouble of setting the bill. By the way, captain, you must breakfast with me when it's over. And now I think of it, captain, a surgeon will also be unnecessary, as I don't like half way work, and never miss the heart. Good morning to you."

"Good morning, Mr. Jinx."

And his heavy boots tramped down the stairs and out of the house; whereupon I returned to my room, bolted the door, and throwing myself into a chair, reviewed the events of the preceding two or three weeks, while the perspiration bathed my forehead and ran down upon my cheeks, and off from the end of my nose.

"Good heavens!" I mentally exclaimed, after a few minutes of unenviable self-communion. "If I haven't got myself into a fix then I can only say I must be wholly and altogether unacquainted with the proper definition of the word 'fix.' Here am I, a quiet, inoffensive gentleman, who, in company with a friend, has come down here to this out-of-the-way place to rusticate for a few weeks. Almost the first day of my arrival, I am introduced to Miss Mary Jones, a young lady, as pretty as a pink, as proud as a peacock, and rather coquettish—to say nothing about her fortune of thirty thousand dollars. I forthwith began to play the agreeable to the young lady, and with such success as to render furious this great yellow-headed monster of a Smithers, who has also been playing the agreeable for some time. Smithers tries to drive me from the field, and fails; I try to drive Smithers from the field, and also fail. The young lady whom we both adore—to say nothing of her little fortune of thirty thousand dollars—will decide in favor of neither, but keeps both in tow like two sculpins on a double-hooked line. At length Smithers becomes enraged at some decided preference shown to myself, and that he may remove such an insurmountable obstacle from his path, sends this great hulking ogre of a fellow, Captain Fitz Battleaxe, with a face like a lion, and a figure like the king of the Visigoths, with a challenge! I put on the courageous and terrific, trying to bluff the great hulking fellow off; great hulking fellow wont be bluffed off, but, on the contrary, rather seems to admire my spirit! Not knowing what else to do, I keep up the false pretence until it is all arranged for us to meet in mortal combat to-morrow morning at sunrise, at the Blasted Cypress in Dead Man's Hollow. I'm blasted if I know where the place is, or ever want to!"

Here I was compelled to pause in my soliloquy to give a shudder; the name of "Dead Man's Hollow" was so suggestive that a succession of cold shivers kept chasing each other down my back and into my boots for several minutes. Recovering, I proceeded with the summing up:

"Now, then, the question arises, what the deuce am I to do? Yes, verily, that is a question—what am I to do? This monster of a Smithers is a regular fire-eater, a dead shot, who has the reputation of being able to 'ring the bell' nine times out of ten; gad, he'll ring my bell for me if he ever gets a pop at my figure,—while on my part, I never fired a pistol above half a dozen times in my life, and if my memory serves, I didn't hit anything either one of those half dozen times. At this moment I am persuaded that I should not be able to hit the gable end of a barn at four paces, much less the figure of a bloodthirsty wretch, who at the same moment would be pointing the muzzle of a pistol right down my throat. But this is nothing to the case; I am merely reviewing the difficulties without suggesting a remedy. I can't fight him—that's clear; it would be nothing more nor less than suicide to think of such a thing. Not that I am afraid—far from it! I flatter myself I have an abundance of the description of courage that is needed for a man to face the enemies of his country in the field of battle, where he has thousands to keep him company, and the rat tat, tatting drum, and the squeal, squeal, squealing life, to lead him

"To his gory bed or to victory!"

But it is a very different sort of thing to go out at daybreak, on foot and alone, in cool blood and on an empty stomach, to be shot down like a woodchuck in a corner. The question now comes up again—what am I to do? Now, Jinx," I exclaimed, aloud, getting up and pacing my chamber floor; "now, Jinx, my good fellow, what do you propose to do to get out of this scrape? You might run, certainly, but then you would leave a most dismal reputation behind, and worse than all, pretty Mary Jones would forever after hold you in the most unutterable contempt, whereby your heart would be most fearfully lacerated—not to mention her little fortune of thirty thousand dollars; no, you can't run, that's sure. But hold! a glorious idea presents itself. You will write an anonymous letter to the authorities, informing them of the contemplated duel, and the place and time "Is there anything else, Tompkins?" I asked, as he stood twiddling the latch in a hesitating, uncertain sort of way.

"No; only—you wouldn't like to have me sit up with you to-night nor nothing, would you?"

"No, no; of course not. I want to get a good night's rest, so as to be on hand in the morning. So now to please me go right straight along to-bed, or you'll look so sleepy that I shall be ashamed to take you along with me to-morrow. Now do go, there's a good fellow."

"Well, then, good night, if you insist upon it," he said, pressing my hand, while the tears gathered in the honest fellow's eyes.

"Good night," I replied, returning the pressure, and fairly pushing him into the passage and closing the door upon him.

I listened to his retreating footsteps along the entry, and waited to hear the squeaking of his rickety bed, as he turned in; but the regular tramp, tramp, tramp, as he paced back and forth across his chamber floor, soon convinced me that he had no intention of sleeping, whatever I might be disposed to do. This was excessively provoking, and I was just upon the point of going to him and compelling him by force of arms to go to sleep, when I heard him again coming towards my room. This time there was an evident purpose in his coming, for he deliberately closed the door behind him, and advancing into the room, set his candle down upon the table and himself on a chair, where he remained looking steadfastly and mournfully at me.

"Well, what the deuce do you want now, Tompkins?" I snarled.

"Why, the fact is, Jinx," he replied, twirling his thumbs and crossing and uncrossing his legs uneasily; "the fact is, I have been thinking about this business of yours and have hit upon a plan to fix it all right. This brute of a Smithers, you know, is what they call a dead shot, while you are a little out of practice—that is, you haven't been doing anything of the kind lately. Now the plan I thought of was this: You know I am a first rate shot—you know that, don't you? A splendid shot! Never miss my mark with a pistol!" (Tompkins might well say that, for to my certain knowledge he never fired a pistol in his life, and didn't know a percussion cap from a side of sole leather). "Well, what I was thinking was, that you might be taken unexpectedly sick; a sudden attack of—of—say a sudden attack of the dropsy, or the whooping cough, or something dreadful; and not liking to disappoint Smithers, you would let your second take up your quarrel. Wouldn't it be a great joke, when Smithers found that instead of meeting a person out of practice, like yourself, he had got to fight a dead shot and a regular fire-eater like me?"

"Pooh, pooh, Tompkins, don't be a fool."

"I aint a fool, Jinx; I give you my word I aint; but you know it's very different with me from what it is with you. You have got friends, lots of friends, who would be inconsolable if you were to be—that is to say—if you were to be—sort of—of killed; while 'taint so with me. If there was any accident happen to me, why, there would be nobody to fret about it, don't you see; there isn't anybody cares much of anything for me I aint anybody without you; I'm only the tail to your kite; if you come down, I'm sure to be floored; while you might part with me and still be as good as new, don't you see? And then wouldn't it be fun to see how surprised our friend Smithers would be to find he'd got me to fight with; he, he, he!" And poor Tompkins made a dismal effort to appear jolly.

"Now, Tompkins, don't talk nonsense," I replied, coughing violently; for I had swallowed a piece of cigar, or something, that sort of choked me. "Your feelings do honor to your heart, I suppose, but we fighting men don't understand that sort of thing! We, warriors, delight in blood! I may say, we absolutely revel in slaughter! No, no—I wouldn't fail of meeting him on any consideration."

"No, Jinx, you mustn't think of doing such a thing!" he replied, with more firmness than I had supposed him capable of.

"Why, Tompkins, what a fool you are!" I returned, with a burst of confidence; for I saw there was no getting rid of him unless I let him into the secret. "To tell you the truth, my boy, I have no notion of shooting Smithers, or letting him shoot me. We shall meet on the ground, to be sure, but I've got a little plan of my own that will prevent any evil consequences. There, does that satisfy you? Now go to-bed, do, or you will prevent me from putting my plan in execution."

"By jingo, old fellow! I am a fool, as you say," he exclaimed, with animation. "I ought to have known you would fix things. By Jove! I'm the happiest fellow south of Mason & Dixon's line. Yes, I will go to-bed. Good night." And he scampered along the passage, whistling like a fifer.

Having disposed of him, I managed with some little difficulty to get out of the house unobserved, and took my way towards the residence of the justice whom I intended to favor with my warning epistle. It was yet quite early conducted in triumph back to the village with a little million of boys at our tail, and placed in durance vile at the hotel—Tompkins and myself in one room, guarded by three constables, and Smithers and his second in another, similarly guarded—where we awaited the opening of the court, which was to be held for our especial benefit, for the purpose of imposing a fine in consequence of our gross violation of the laws of the State, and the peace and dignity thereof; and also to place us under good and sufficient bonds to keep the peace toward mankind generally and each other particularly, for the space of a given number of months.

Numerous versions of the story of the attempted duel and its unfortunate interruption were rapidly noised abroad through all the region round about, very naturally producing the most intense excitement, so much so, indeed, that by nine o'clock, A. M., the large hall over "the store," where the town justice was usually dispensed, was literally packed with a curious and eager multitude, a "handsome" proportion of which were ladies, among whom I had the satisfaction of observing Miss Mary Jones, the pretty cause of all this hubbub and commotion. She was looking unusually charming, even for her, with her wavy, silken, yellow hair, her dimpled chin and violet-colored eyes—not to mention her little fortune of thirty thousand dollars. I caught her eye as we were marshalled into the hall. She knew well enough what had been the occasion of our going out "for to fight," the minx, and she smiled so sweetly and approvingly upon me that for the moment I felt really sorry I had not allowed my opponent to pitch a small hunk of lead in among my vitals for her sake. But my rapture was somewhat qualified upon perceiving that she bestowed an equally fascinating glance upon my rival—these gals, confound 'em, can't be satisfied with taking a man's heart right out of his thorax, but unless they can render him of all flesh the most miserable with jealousy, they do not seem to consider their conquest half completed.

The entire assembly were evidently very much disposed in our favor; for after all, people do like spunk, however peaceable and law-abiding they may be themselves. The gentlemen crowded about us, and shook hands alternately with Smithers and myself, while the ladies showed their dear little white teeth at us whenever we looked towards them.

Presently three justices marched in and took their seats at the upper end of the hall, looking very grave and learned, and consequently very stupid. Several legal gentlemen were already in attendance, one of whom was the prosecuting attorney, or whatever else he may be called. I may be giving him the wrong title, for I'm no lawyer myself, and do not pretend to much knowledge of law—that is to say, in criminal matters,—but if you take me on the way of transacting business in a debtor's court, I am thar. Well, as I was saying, the prosecuting attorney opened the case by commenting somewhat at length upon the heinousness of the crime we had meditated, stating that he had been warned of the affair the day before, and wound up by asking permission to introduce a few witnesses.

At this stage of the proceedings, a very young legal gentleman got upon his legs, and in a grandiloquent period announced his intention of defending us; a proceeding on his part which brought Captain Fitz Battleaxe to his feet, with the mild remark:

"Look here, young man, just sit down or I'll knock you down; our case is ridiculous enough now without you making it more so."

"Why, I intended to defend you!" exclaimed the amazed disciple of—of the old scratch.

"Yes, I know it," replied Fitz Battleaxe, sharply; "take the other side of the case, and you may spout till doomsday if it pleases you."

The demolished counsel vanished, and the case proceeded.

"James Squealpig, take the stand," said the prosecuting attorney.

A little, short, chunky, foxy-looking fellow took the stand and was sworn.

"Now, Mr. Squealpig," said the counsel, "you came to me yesterday with the information that this meeting was to take place. I want you to state to the court how you discovered the fact."

"I didn't discover it at all; I was told."

"Very well; who told you?"

"The man that sent me to you."

"Well, who was that man?"

"He gave me a dollar not to tell, and I promised I wouldn't."

"Mr. Squealpig," said the counsel, severely, "remember you are under oath. If you do not answer more directly I shall move that you be fined for contempt. Who was that man, sir?"

"Well, then, if I must tell," replied the witness, doggedly, "it was—Mr. Smithers!"

"Mr. Smithers!" simultaneously exclaimed almost every individual in the court room, "Mr. Smithers!"

"Mr. Smithers!" reiterated the witness.

The excitement produced by this unexpected announcement was most intense. Fitz Battle-car. Those two noses belonged to Tompkins and myself respectively.

Smithers left town by a private conveyance at about the same time. In regard to pretty Mary Jones, whose history I learned some time afterwards, it appears that Captain Fitz Battleaxe, immediately upon our departure, commenced paying his court to her in a very decided manner; in point of fact, laying regular and scientific siege to her; killing, wounding and maiming all who dared make any pretensions to her hand, until she was fairly compelled, by force of arms, as it were, to drop her maiden Jones and become Mrs. Captain Plantagenet Fitz Battleaxe, and the valiant captain is at this moment cheered by the smiles of a lovely and loving wife—not to mention her little fortune of thirty thousand dollars.

My apology for not winding up with a moral, after the approved fashion, is that the story itself teaches absolutely nothing, without, indeed, its perusal may induce the young gentlemen of this country, upon receiving a challenge, either to say yes and fight without any nonsense, or to say no and plead principle; in either of which cases they will gain a reputation with some portion of the community. The story is not written in vain, however, for the young ladies will be pleased that pretty Mary Jones—not to mention her little fortune of thirty thousand dollars—escaped the cowardly Smithers and fell into the hands of a brave man; the old ladies will be pleased that there was no blood shed; I, myself, am pleased because I got an excellent price for this article; and now that we are all pleased and smiling, I will cry "whoa" at once, and hold my horses where I am, before anything happens to vex any of us.

A VORACIOUS PIKE.

We find it recorded in an English publication that, some time ago, two young gentlemen of Dumfries, while fishing at Dalswinton Loch, having expended their stock of worms, etc., had recourse to the expedient of picking out the eyes of the dead perch they had taken, and attaching them to their hooks—a bait which this fish is known to take as readily as any other. One of the perch caught in this manner struggled so much when taken out of the water that the hook had no sooner been loosened from its mouth than it came in contact with one of its own eyes, and actually tore it out. In the struggle, the fish slipped through the holder's fingers, and again escaped to its native element. The disappointed fisher, still retaining the eye of the aquatic fugitive, adjusted it on the hook, and again committed his line to the waters. After a very short interval, on pulling up the line, he was astonished to find the identical perch that had eluded his grasp a few minutes before, and which literally perished in swallowing its own eye.—Fish Stories.

HOW TO PROMOTE PEACE IN A FAMILY.

Remember that our will is likely to be crossed every day, so prepare for it.

Everybody in the house has an evil nature as well as ourselves, and therefore we are not to expect too much.

To learn the different temper and disposition of each individual.

To look on each member of the family as one for whom we should have a care.

When any good happens to any one, to rejoice at it.

When inclined to give an angry answer, to "overcome evil with good."

If from sickness, pain or infirmity, we feel irritable, to keep a strict watch over ourselves.

To observe when others are so suffering, and drop a word of kindness and sympathy suited to them.

To watch the little opportunities of pleasing, and to put little annoyances out of the way.

To take a cheerful view of everything, even of the weather, and encourage hope.

To speak kindly to the servants—to praise them for little things when you can.

In all little pleasures which may occur, to put yourself last.

To try for "the soft answer which turneth away wrath."

When we have been pained by an unkind word or deed, to ask ourselves: "Have I not often done the same and been forgiven?"

In conversation, not to exalt yourself, but to bring others forward.

To be very gentle with the young ones, and treat them with respect.

Never to judge one another harshly, but to attribute a good motive when we can.—Life Illustrated.

A SIGHT OF A GREAT MAN.

Goethe, like many other celebrated men, was somewhat annoyed by the visits of strangers. A student once called at his house, and requested to see him. Goethe, contrary to his usual custom, consented to be seen; and after the student had waited some time in the ante-chamber, he appeared, and without speaking, took a chair, and seated himself in the middle of the room. The student, far from being embarrassed with this unexpected proceeding, took a lighted wax candle in his hand, and walking round the poet, deliberately viewed him on all sides; and, setting down the candle, he drew out his purse, and taking from it a small piece of silver, put it on the table, and went away without speaking a word.—Lewes.

EFFECTS OF EARLY EDUCATION.

Lady Raffles in her memoirs of her husband, Sir Stamford Raffles, mentions the singular fact that "two young tigers and a bear were for some time in the children's apartments, under the charge of their attendant, without being confined in cages; and it was rather curious to see the children, the bears, the tigers, a blue mountain bird, and a favorite cat, all playing together—the parrot's bill being the only object of awe to all the party."—New York Mirror.

The pound-keeper laughed, and took advantage of the laugh to hesitate. The answer was fairly corkscrewed out of him :

"Wal, I s'pose Mr. Butts drove 'em."

And he laughed again.

Tubbs could hardly keep in his boots, he was so moved with indignation.

"Butts drive my cattle to pound!" said he, lowering his brows and setting his teeth. "I'll teach him a lesson yet! Mebbe some of his own critters 'll get out one of these days. Then we'll see how the account stands!"

He paid the usual pound tax with a great deal more of such grumbling as this, and drove off his three head of cattle. The old keeper couldn't help laughing, as he went away, and wondered in truth what would come of it.

"It's a thing I never knew Butts to do the like of before," muttered he, trudging along homewards. "What in the name of Satan has got into him lately? He hardly spoke to me, the last time he met me. Don't appear as he used to. But I'll fetch him yet. I never'll stand this, not the longest day I live! never!"

Only ten days or two weeks after that, Mr. Tubbs came into the house in a great glee.

"See here, wife," said he, chuckling to himself, "I've got old Butts's cattle shet up in my yard, and jest as quick as I can eat my dinner, I'm goin' to drive 'em off to pound. I can't very well spare the time, but I'm going to do it, for all that. He took my critters to pound, and to pound shall his go! There's no two ways about that. What's good for me, is good enough for him! See if there aint a squirm in' this time!"

And before night, a couple of Mr. Butts's most staid and matronly old cows were ruminating by themselves on the changes and chances of this mortal life, within the ancient enclosure called the "pound." Just so long as they remained, the keeper would be at liberty to make use of the fruits of their udders. There they stood and looked at each other, and chewed their cuds, as innocent as children of the intentions of the one who caused their imprisonment.

When night came on, two of Mr. Butts's best cows were not to be found. They didn't come home from the pasture. He hunted and hunted everywhere—but no cows. He looked over the walls, in the woods, in the swamp, behind the old barn in the meadow, and in every other place where a cow might stow herself away—but nothing like two cows yet.

At last, after he had finally given them up for the night, a little boy came running down the road, who hurried up to him and told him where his stray cattle were.

"And Mr. Mulkey says," added the boy, "that if you don't come arter 'em pretty quick, he'll milk 'em himself!"

In less than fifteen minutes, Mr. Butts made a formal demand upon the pound-keeper for his cows. And when he had got them safely out, he turned and demanded to know who drove them there in the first place.

Mulkey laughed, just as he laughed before, and hesitated; and then he told Mr. Butts that his neighbor Tubbs was the author of the mischief.

"Tubbs drive my cows to pound!" said he to himself. "Then, by jingo, he shall pay-back for it, jest as soon as I can make pay-day come round!"

And he started off home with his pair of cows, convinced that a game that two could play at, was not exactly the game for his money.

From this date, all intercourse between the families was suspended. There was a broad lake between them, which neither could pass over. At meeting on Sundays, or on any day through the week, it was all the same. Neither party seemed to be conscious that the other still remained in existence—with a single exception. For all this time Mr. Butts's son Sam had been paying his particular attentions to Mr. Tubbs's daughter Susan. Up to this point, Sam and Susan had been making out very well. But close upon this outbreak followed something of an estrangement between themselves.

Says Susan, one evening, to Sam :

"I don't exactly like the way your folks talk about ours—I don't. What is the meaning of it, I want to know?"

"I guess they don't say worse things than what your folks say about us," rejoined Sam, with the Butts blood flowing swift in his veins.

"Umph!" retorted Susan. "What did your father drive our cattle to pound for?"

"And what did your father drive our cattle to pound for, too? It's a pretty piece of business, I think!"

Beginning there, the two lovers got a good start. Then they went on at a rate that astonished even themselves. They twitted. Then they used satire. Then they threw mud at one another's names. Then they had an out-and-out spat about it. And at last, the quarrel was too far in to be got out of at all.

Sam said he was as good as anybody, and so were his folks. Susan declared that he'd always thought he was a little better, but he'd find now that he was mistaken. Sam thought there was no use in twitting, for two could perform at that. But Susan was not to be frightened, she

'O, HUSH THAT SONG!

BY MARTIN HERBELL.

O, hush that song, that gentle song;
 'Tis bringing to my heart
 The memories, as we glide along,
 That I fain would bid depart.
 For an icy stillness had gathered o'er
 My weary heart and brain;
 But those words have awaked that hidden love,
 In its anguish wild again.

O, hush that song, for the lips that breathed
 Those words to my listening ear
 Are far away, and that cherished voice
 I shall never, never hear.
 I strove to forget in the busy world,
 And to hide my soul's deep pain;
 But memory with realisation strength awakes—
 O, sing not that song again.

THE CHILD-ARTIST.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

IF THERE was a low, timid knock at Mr. Hilton's back door, which after some little delay was opened by a girl who was busy in the kitchen preparing tea. She felt in no good humor at the interruption, and her feeling of ill-temper were not ameliorated, when she saw, standing on the door-step, a little, poorly-clad girl, from whose face, suffering and want had blotted out all that freshness and bloom, which always gives a certain charm to the features of childhood, even when they have no pretensions to beauty, or to delicacy of outline.

"I expected to find a beggar at the door, and am disappointed," said Minda, the girl who opened the door. "What do you want?" she inquired, in a sharp, angry voice.

A quick blush passed over the child's face, and there was a deprecating look in the dark, mournful eyes, which were raised to Minda's.

"I thought that, perhaps, you would give me one of those fine peaches for my brother," said she, pointing to a tree which grew near the garden fence, and whose boughs were bending beneath their burden of luxurious fruit, now glowing in the light of the evening sunbeams.

"It is a mighty modest request for a beggar to make," said Minda. "If you want a piece of bread, I'll give it to you, but who ever thought of giving beautiful ripe peaches to such as you?"

"Winnie is sick, and has been begging of mother all day to buy him a peach, but she hasn't a penny in the world, so I told her that perhaps some one would give me one for him."

During this colloquy a child seven years old, her head covered with soft, brown curls, and her blue eyes unconsciously filling with tears, stood at the door, which opened into the kitchen, earnestly listening. When she heard what the little girl last said, she darted up stairs and entered the room, where her father, who had returned home half an hour earlier than usual, was reading the newspaper to her mother, while waiting for tea. She approached her mother softly, and whispered some request. Mrs. Hilton gave a smiling assent, and the child with a joyous bound had already nearly reached the door, when her father looked up from his paper and said:

"What is it, my daughter?"

"There is a little girl at the back door, who wants a peach for her sick brother, and Emily wishes to give her one," said Mrs. Hilton.

"May I?" said Emily, addressing her father.

"Yes, a dozen, if you please."

"Then I'll fill my little willow basket with them. It will hold full a dozen, I know it will. If I could only reach some of those large ones at the top of the tree, that look so ripe and mellow."

"I believe I must lend you a helping hand," said Mr. Hilton, laying aside his newspaper.

"O, I can hear Minda shutting the door now. She has turned her away. But never mind—I can overtake her."

The next moment Emily stood at the outer door of the kitchen. The little girl, with a drooping, sorrowful look, and tear-stains on her pale cheeks, was just closing the gate.

"Come back," said Emily, "and you shall have plenty of peaches for your sick brother, and for yourself, too. I have got leave to give you this basket heaped up full."

"Have you?" said the girl, in a quick, earnest voice, which was full of joyful surprise.

"Yes, and father is going to gather me some of the largest and ripest ones."

Mr. Hilton, at this moment, made his appearance, and placing a garden-chair beneath the tree, to enable him to reach the higher limbs, the little willow basket was not only soon filled, but plenty of them which had accidentally fallen, were lying among the grass. Emily, in the meantime, had selected some sprays of the bright green peach leaves, which she quickly arranged among the glowing fruit, heightening by contrast its rich, delicious hues, and making it appear more tempting.

"There," said Emily, handing her the basket, "I want you to carry it home just as it is now, because the peaches look so beautifully among the green leaves, it will make them taste better."

The look of sadness was now all gone from the little girl's eyes, and instead, they sparkled with strength too severely. He used, when his father was alive, to sit hours at his side, watching the figures on the canvass, momentarily glowing into more vivid life beneath the pencil. It was thus that the love of art was silently and imperceptibly implanted in his bosom."

It was even so. The bud was already glinting forth, destined, one day, to expand into the flower. As Ella had said, he loved everything which was beautiful, and the contemplation of a star, a flower, or even a golden sunbeam, which at a certain hour, peeped over a shed that stood opposite, and then stole in at the top of the window, afforded him exquisite delight.

The bird sketched with a bit of charcoal was produced, and Mr. and Mrs. Hilton were surprised at the skill of hand, and the delicacy of touch which it exhibited.

A little brown bird which often hovered about the back door, had served him as a model, Mrs. Selby said, and it proved to be quite a faithful likeness of the original.

"You would like to be an artist then," said Mr. Hilton, turning to the boy, after listening to these few particulars, told him by Mrs. Selby.

"Yes, sir," was the quiet answer, but the sudden flush that overspread his countenance, and the lighting up of his eyes, showed how deeply the question moved him.

"Your wish shall be gratified," said Mr. Hilton. "As soon as you are strong enough, I will see that you are placed under an able master."

Fourteen years, with their burden of care and sorrow, brightened now and then by a few gleams of sunshine, have merged into the past.

"There, the light is better here—much better," said a young man, removing a picture that hung against the wall of a small, elegantly furnished apartment, and placing it so as to avoid the cross-lights, which came in from the two opposite windows. "Don't you think it is, Emily?" said he, addressing a lady who stood looking at the picture.

"Yes, much better," she replied; and as she stood with her head a little thrown back, the light of her violet eyes beaming from beneath their long, silky lashes, and the rich, brown curls falling back from her forehead, no one could have failed to remark the resemblance between her and the child of seven years old, represented in the picture, who stood beneath a peach tree, holding a little basket of wicker work, into which a fine-looking gentleman was dropping some of the fruit, gathered from the boughs over his head.

Another child whose appearance formed a striking contrast to hers, stood near the garden fence, the tears which still hung on her eye-lashes brightened with smiles.

"But what have you here, Edwin, so carefully covered?" said Emily.

"A companion for the picture we have been looking at. I made a rude sketch of it when I was only ten years old, which, in compliance with your father's request, I have recently transferred to canvass."

He removed the cloth which covered it, and revealed the home-picture, which Mr. and Mrs. Hilton had many years previously gazed upon through the half-curtained window of Mrs. Selby's humble domicile.

"I should know those large, earnest eyes, anywhere," said Emily, indicating a boy who was sitting at a table, sketching a basket of peaches. "But in every other respect you have altered, if I except that somewhat proud curve of the upper lip."

"I little thought," said he, "as I sat there with my piece of coarse paper and bit of charcoal, that hidden among the fruit I was copying, was a golden key which would open to me so bright a vista in the future. How sad would have been my destiny—how sad that of my mother and sister, if she who is now my wife, had not obeyed the warm impulses of her generous nature. Truly, the angel stirred the waters of the fountain at the right moment."

PERFUME OF FLOWERS.

The perfume of flowers may be gathered in a very simple manner, and without apparatus. Gather the flowers with as little stalk as possible, and place them in a jar, three parts full of olive or almond oil. After being in the oil twenty-four hours, put them in a coarse cloth and squeeze the oil from them. This process, with fresh flowers, is to be repeated according to the strength of the perfume required. The oil being thus thoroughly perfumed with the volatile principle of the flowers, is to be mixed with an equal quantity of pure spirits, and shaken every day for a fortnight, when it may be poured off, ready for use.—N. E. Farmer.

THE MARSEILLAISE.

"It was," said Lamartine, "the fire-water of the Revolution which instilled into the senses and the soul of the people the intoxication of battle." "The Marseillaise Hymn" is the French Revolution set to music, and although there may be some sacrifice of sense to sound in the sentence, it is in the main true. In a quiet, peaceful epoch, such a lyric could never have been composed; but amid the blaze of torches, and ruined palaces and prisons, it sounds like the circle of divinity, frantic with passionate love for our race.

grave, with my own dust stuffed between my teeth.

Passion's first impulse was to follow the stranger and slay him; but my father's frequent charge of rashness fell upon me like a palsy. Sick, faint, terrified and agonized, I went on to gaze vacantly at the plum trees and to pat my Arab stallion—a gift from Captain Angelo just before he died. Bem rubbed his nose against my breast, as if he snuffed the pain and pain would console me with his brute affection. I began to love the horse. The stranger never again made his appearance at the lake.

When our child came into the world he had black hair, large, liquid, unhappy eyes. His countenance was noble; he looked a little like me; but more—ah! much more—like the handsome unknown. Was it fancy? I had ere this overcome my suspicions.

"The stranger," said my other self, "found himself an unintentional intruder on private grounds, and with true delicacy, withdrew as soon as he discovered it."

But when our little boy came into the world, I began to renew an early question: "Why did Bella tell Lizette to admit no one but me? Had not some one else been there before? She must have thought it unsafe for him that day."

More cruel thoughts time and Bella's devotion had put to death; but now they arose from the grave. I was fearfully unhappy. Everybody is unhappy. There is something to torture every heart. We all try to look happier than we are. I tried it no longer. Bella knew now I was a man-hater; her happiness was gone.

"I can but do my duty and die," she said, "since I no longer make you happy. Will you never tell me what it is?"

"What is what?"

"That which has changed you so; that which makes you so miserable."

As I had never had the least confirmation of my suspicions I did not dare to tell her; for I knew then she would despise me—and to be despised by Bella!

"No," said I, to myself, "I will wait until I can take revenge—on her—or somebody—on all the world."

I purchased a quick poison to give the child, but had not the badness of heart to administer it. Then I bought a different kind; one that would consume slowly. My soul revolted at the thought of revenge on an infant.

"Let it live to curse them," said I.

"Be ashamed," said my other self; "rise above your unjust suspicions, throw off the shackles of fear—be reasonable."

I sold the lake villa, and we moved into Parma. Madly I plunged into literature, until it ceased to have any charms. I had plucked the branches of every fruit, every flower, every leaf, and threw it from me; but I had gained a name and was a lion in society. Bella went little into company. She was prudent, while I was rash. My flirtations became the talk of the circles, the sport of idlers, the laugh of gigglers.

The cavaliers now began to approach my wife. I knew how scornfully she flashed back the least advance. In spite of me, my other self exclaimed, "Nothing can corrupt her." But one day I had just turned the corner nearest to my house, when I saw a man step quickly from my door. I saw not his face; it was turned the other way; but I knew the gait, the form; the tout-ensemble convinced me it was the unknown. I leaped forward after him. Bella was at the window as I passed. I gnashed my teeth at her. But this very act, the first cruelty I had shown her, my beloved, reproached me instantly. Besides, her pale face gleamed like a spear into my heart as the reproach of my father rose up with its warning fore-finger shaking at me, "Rash Bartolo, beware!" I hesitated, halted, turned into my own home.

"Who is he?" I demanded, sinking on the sofa.

To my astonishment, Bella replied:

"I cannot tell, Bartolo."

I jumped up furiously.

"Do you pretend you do not know that man?"

"I do not know him. Let go your fierce hold on my arm!"

"What did he say to you?"

"Nothing."

"What did he want?"

"I do not know."

"What did that man have to do in my own house?"

"I cannot tell you, Bartolo."

"You will pretend next, signora, that you did not see him at all," said I, with a sneer—a sneer ill fitting the features of a man of generosity; the husband, guide and protector of a wife and child.

"I did see him," said Bella, with a tender voice. "He did not speak, but he did do something which in honor I am not to reveal."

"Honor? ingrate!" I said in a tone so deep and harsh it must have troubled heaven, and set all the fiends below in a great glee, as I think now, when I think how I should have treated my Bella—the gift of God.

Bella came and sat by my aching side, so pale

The stranger seemed greatly moved.

"Do you mock me with pretended grief for Bella?" I asked, in an altered but still angry tone—angry, for I was only bent on seeing mischief continually in that which proceeded from him.

The unknown seemed entirely unable to repress his emotions. Yet he uttered not a word to the last, but as he turned away gave me a look that plainly expressed some pity—or was it gratitude for nothing more than the softening of my voice? The door shut to, leaving me involved in deeper misery than ever.

"My persecutor is there," I said. "Some powerful nobleman, dwelling on terms of intimacy with the duke himself."

My despair grew black.

Almost instantly after his departure, the door re-opened, the guards came in, my chains were struck off and I was taken out of the cell.

"Am I free?" I asked.

"That would not be safe, nor right," sounded an unknown voice behind me.

They led the way through several corridors, and finally brought me to a narrow passage open to the sky between two walls. A door opened to the right, and I found myself in a large casemate. I looked out through an embrasure upon a little flower garden, situated in the demilune outwork, fronting my new quarters, which were in the curtain between two strong bastions. This fortified side of the palace was hidden from the citizens passing hourly by a high wall and still higher trees.

In one corner of the room stood a camp bedstead, silver mounted. There was also a secretary near the window, in which I found some paper, stamped with a cypher; a travelling library case, filled with political, military and new poetical works, completed my accommodations. I was in humor for none of them. I threw myself upon the bed, stared long at the ceiling, and then shut my eyes tightly, to look if possible upon my heart. The sight was revolting! Seized with frenzy, I leaped up and began to look for some instrument of self-destruction. There was nothing at hand. I observed a closet door.

"Perhaps," said I, "there may be something within."

The door was locked. In striving to pull it open I wrought myself into a fury, and with my foot dashed the door to pieces:

"No object here, after all.—Stay! on the top shelf I see a small painting."

Were I dying, I could stay to look at a picture. I took it down.

"What! the picture of Bella!"

What a variety of feelings shook my frame! The sight of her, the thought of him who had undoubtedly painted her—the unknown; this, too, was his chamber. Suicide fled from my heart like a shadow before the sun-rays of these piercing emotions. "I have something yet to live for."

When a desperate man makes up his mind to live, he becomes a calm and rational being. The great fever on my brain subsided. I performed my toilet, and stepped out of the embrasure, down a flight of stairs, crossed the fosse and walked up the ramp which led to the flower garden in the demilune. Here I conversed with my flowers—I say mine, because to look at a flower in the moment of its fullness of beauty, is to take possession as completely as if the actual owner were present and gave you livery of seizin. I plucked the brightest and most beautiful. Conscience! conscience! in every one of their faces I saw the eyes of my infant, or the white, crazed face of my wife! I looked up to the sky. Out of every fleecy cloud gazed down upon me those two reproachful, ghastly countenances. Such is the distortion of guilt, that even the gentlest and most beautiful things, signor, turn into shapes that frighten us.

Shuddering, I retreated to my casemate and threw myself upon my knees to implore the All-Pitying, to plead with him the cause of jealousy, infatuation, madness, and to invoke the blessed virgin. Though both veiled their faces, I arose somewhat calmed, or stultified; took down some books and tried in a rambling manner to read. Here I fell into a dreamy void, out of which the guards startled me. Leaving my supper, they withdrew in silence.

And night came, with the glaring, horrid moon, which I vainly strove to curtain out from my embrasure. Seizing a pen, I began to dash off some lines of a merry call—sparkling, leaping, mad with humor. On pausing a moment, I glanced at the top of the page and saw I had begun it "The Pleasures of Murder." Starting from the secretary with a curse, I went to the window looking on the narrow passage. This was about eight feet wide. The opposite wall was much taller than that of my casemate. "Part of the palace wall proper," said I.

In the third story ran a suite of bedrooms, for there were the windows. In one of them gleamed a light. The idea of another human being in his bedroom filled me with interest.

"He, too, may be miserable," said I; "avoiding the companionship of man voluntarily."

As I gazed upward, the shadow of a figure crossed the window. It came again. The man was pacing his apartment. Good! "Misery loves company." I felt a nearer fellow-feeling. He now paused at the window, and looked down at mine. "Is it? Yes, it is the unknown!"

O never, signor, saw I such a sorrowful visage. "Who knows whether cruelty and wrong would not often be glad to change fates with their victim?" thought I. And I began to pity, or at least despise my persecutor. I threw up towards him such glances of hatred and contempt that he quickly turned away.

Antonio, my brother, came with Lizette. Until now my heart was stony hard, standing alone in the desert of woe. The confiding grief, the pity and condolence of these two unsuspecting hearts was the rod which smote the rock. I wept with them—they little knew why."

"But for what am I confined?" I asked of Antonio.

"For—for lunacy. The duke expresses much sorrow at your having been thrown into a dungeon, and declares you shall be kept and cared for beneath his own roof, until—"

Fools! all believed me mad.

"We have come to share your temporary captivity," continued Antonio.

"And to nurse you ourselves," said Lizette.

"I am not mad."

"So much the better," said Lizette.

"I need no nurses."

"But you want a companion," said Antonio. "I will remain with you."

It was not without much difficulty I persuaded them to go home again. I went to-bed, resolving in mind some scheme by which I might reach the apartments of the unknown.

I fell into a nervous sleep. The moon came creeping, creeping towards my bed, with its white, wan fingers, to clutch me. It had gained the chair on which my clothes were lying, when the door opened, and a figure entered with a long bright stiletto in his hand. He glared savagely at me, and whetted his lips, as it were. He began to advance towards me. In the middle of the room he paused. Again he moved forward, till, gaining my bedside, he stood over me, whetting his lips again, and raising the stiletto. I dragged the counterpane over my face, thinking, in his uncertain aim, he might miss my heart. Then, suddenly changing my mind, I threw the counterpane up towards his face and jumped with my whole force upon him.

Signor, I found myself standing in the middle of the room, its sole occupant. Was it all a dream? I looked at the chair on which lay my clothes, the moon had not advanced a finger's breadth. O, the rapidity of conscience-troubled dreams!

After long tossing in wretchedness, I again fell asleep—or was I still awake?—when another figure rose, as if from the floor, and the unknown stood boldly before me. What had I just exclaimed the moment before? "Bartolo! the baby is falling out of bed!" The unknown must have heard this. Now he is convinced of my guilt. Now or never I must strangle him!

But, signor, much as we hate, much as we ache for revenge, the conscience within makes us fearfully weak in the presence of him who knows we have wronged him. I lay panting, passionless, trembling, nerveless with remorseful agony. His face was pale as the crucified One, and if possible, more sorrowful. He seemed in the light of the ghastly moon to be transfigured into the angel of woe. I covered my mouth with my hand. After regarding me awhile with such a penetrating gaze that I felt myself rent apart and read to the inmost soul, my visitor turned mutely away, vouchsafing me no sign, save a shake of the head, which meant too plainly, "Yes, he is guilty—not mad." And the word "guilty, guilty, guilty!" rang through the rest of the night. It took a palpable form; I could even see it rolling along the arched ceiling, down the sidewalk, into my ear, till it griped my heart.

Next morning I waited only to be cast again into the dungeon. But with the morrow came the court surgeon. His attendants were men of strength, and evidently anticipated a good struggle, for, besides their vials and globules, they brought ropes and a straight jacket. But I talked so rationally with the physician that he dismissed them. We talked the news of court and country, and feelingly deplored the failure of the late attempt of Italy to regain her freedom.

"And now," said he, rising to depart, "I shall hasten to the duke, and in a few days, at most, I hope to meet you in your own house."

"Doctor," said I, "what little bird is that on your head?"

The doctor looked blank. Then—I suppose to humor his patient—he said:

"Nothing here."

"O, sir, you are deceived. Believe me, it is a little monster."

Now he laughed with feigned heartiness. I had gone far enough to escape the straight jacket, and yet to remain where I was, at least till I could settle accounts with my unknown foe.

The question was to get at, and not go from, the palace; to leave my own room and reach the chamber of Bella's lover—no further. My door could not be forced, my window was heavily barred with iron, but the walls and wainscot bore the traces of antiquity. I surmised that at one time there may have been some secret communication with the adjoining rooms. I therefore began to sound every part of the casemate; the walls, the wainscot, the floor, presented to the touch no hidden spring.

"Perhaps I have been too fast with the court surgeon," was my thought. But I had not yet examined the closet. I opened the door, trembling to see again the face of Bella. The picture was gone! The unknown! had he taken it last night? Then that vision was not all a dream. He must have gone to the closet ere I awoke and saw him.

"He is—he is aware of my guilt! Not a day to be lost. Another hour may find me in the dungeon accused of murder—self-convicted!"

The closet stood in a little niche or arched recess. There must be, thought I, another casemate beyond. I pressed my hand against the back of the closet; my fingers touched it at every point. At last, to my joy, I heard the click of a spring. I pressed harder; beheld a zigzag crack in the wall! My heart thumped violently. To tell the truth, I had worked with little hope of success, and was scarcely prepared for it.

"Shall I proceed? Shall another crime blot out the first?"

My answer was a kick against the plastering, which strewed it over the floor. There was an ancient panel. I soon made a hole large enough to admit my body through the plastering covering the panel beyond, and stood in the next casemate. It was strewn with rubbish, old arms and armor. Good! I selected a valuable sword.

The door was locked like my own, but the window was not barred. At any moment I could be out in the passage between the ramparts and the palace. This was even more than I had dared to hope, when, hesitation banished, I stood in the closet with the stern resolution to break my way through stone partition walls to the presence of my enemy. I returned to my chamber to wait only for the dark covering of night.

Night came. I shuddered and began to cover my eyes with my hands to shut out the twilight shadows and the terrible ghosts that at once beleaguered me. How I could have spent another night there I do not know. I fancied, signor, cold mailed hands were upon me, creeping up my loins towards my heart. I saw faces on the ceiling, and cried out, "Away! away!" I heard a noise—something fell from the bed. I dared not look underneath, lest to behold there my infant, with its neck broken, its dead tongue and dead eyes lolling at me, and worst of all, its little hand shake as it used to shake.

Yet here I waited in a cold sweat till there should be a light in the unknown's chamber. At last—for it seemed an age—the light appeared. I darted through my closet, stumbled over some rusty armor, which gashed my leg, and caused me to leave a trail of blood, vanished through the window and found myself in the passage. I saw at one end the door at which I had entered from the palace the day before. On I stole in the shade of the high wall; but the door was locked. Back I flew to the other end. Here was a little postern gate, barred on the side towards me. Removing the bars, I pursued my way in the dark, through a subterranean gallery. On the right as I groped, I touched a door.

"This," whispered I, "must lead to some mine under the demilune."

Not hesitating, I passed by without trying the door, and soon came to steps, at the top of which was another door.

"Here am I now," said I, taking breath, under the centre of the palace. "Doubtless it will lead me, if I choose to go, to the private apartments of the duke; certainly to any other part of the building."

I put my ear to the keyhole—not a sound. I felt a sort of exhilaration at being here, and paused to enjoy it still further.

"By this door," said I, "a tyrant might escape from the hands of his incensed people; or, conveying powder through the galleries that probably lead to mines in every direction, he might blow up thousands at once. And who would scruple to do that for his revenge?" I laughed and began to feel a new sympathy for tyrants.

Then it flashed across my mind that none but the duke himself can keep the key of this important door; it must lock, too, on the other side. I hastened to try the lock. Fury! the fates are against me! I must now retreat through the dark as far as the side door I had left. The moment I turned my face that way there rose before me all the ghosts of the casemate, backed by a legion of others, grinning, one over the shoulder of another—above them all, the phantom hand! I closed my eyes and shut my teeth fiercely, resolved not to be victimized by such delusions. But there are some delusions more vivid than the most appalling realities. In spite of myself, my knees shook and refused to go; my teeth chattered.

TO AN ABSENT SISTER.

BY MONTROSE ELDRIDGE.

I am lonely, I am lonely,
Although many friends are round;
I am lonely, I am lonely,
For thou art not with them found.

As a flower deprived of sunlight,
Droop I, when afar from thee;
As a bird, with wounded pinion,
With thee yearns my heart to be.

Ever with thee; I am pining,
In the beauty-haunted night;
When the holy stars are shining,
For thy dark eyes' gentle light.

Come to me, O come and cheer me,
With thy spirit stirring tone;
But, alas, thou canst not hear me,
I am lonely, all alone!

BLIND BEATRICE:

— OR, —

THE HISTORY OF A SONATA.

BY MRS. L. S. GOODWIN.

WHEN, by favor of fortune, I formed acquaintance with Beethoven, he was in the epoch of his career between seedtime and harvest. His compositions had been given to the world, some of those which singly will stand as everlasting monuments to his genius; but the world takes its own time for acknowledging benefactions; and he waited, while hope deferred sometimes made the heart sick.

The great man was then very poor. Instead of dwelling, as he did later, proprietor of a chateau on Rhine Street of his native city, he rented an attic over a humble little refreshment stall near Romans' Place. He had, however, his piano, pen, paper and ink, and, notwithstanding his privations, saw many an hour of happiness.

It was in one of his deplorably contrasting moods that I found him one winter evening, sitting at a window in the moonlight, his face concealed in his hands, without fire or candle, his frame quaking with cold. Such was the state of his wardrobe, that he proscribed himself the promenade by day; I had called for the purpose of taking him out, and to make him sup with me afterward.

I soothed his sighs, solicited his company, and exhorted him to cast off his sadness. He went with me, but continued gloomy and despairing, and refused every encouragement.

"I hate all the world," said he, with vehemence.

"I hate myself. Nobody comprehends, nobody cares for me. I have genius, and am treated like an idiot. I have a heart, and no object to love. Would to Heaven, all was over, and forever! Would I was lying tranquilly at the bottom of the river yonder! There are moments when I have difficulty in resisting the temptation to throw myself there," and he pointed to the great Rhine, with its icy waves scintillating in the moonlight.

I made no reply. It was useless to discuss with Beethoven, so he was allowed free course in his paroxysm. He checked himself only when we re-entered the town, and then fell into morose silence.

We were traversing a dark, narrow street near Coblenz gate. Suddenly he halted.

"Hist!" said he, "what sound is that?"

Loading an ear, I heard faintly the strains of an old harpsichord issuing from some house at no great distance. It was a plaintive melody in three time, and, in spite of the ingratitude of the instrument, its execution gave to it a sublime tenderness of expression.

Beethoven looked at me with sparkling eyes.

"It is my symphony in F," said he. "That is the house. Listen. How well it is played!"

The dwelling was small and plain. A light shone through the blinds of the window before which, when we reached the place, we stood rapt listeners. The music continued, and every note was rendered with the same fidelity and the same expression. In the midst of the finale there was a sudden cessation. A moment's silence ensued, then we heard a stifled sigh, with a female voice saying:

"I cannot go on—I can go no further, to-night, Friedrich."

"Why, Beatrice?"

"I do not know why, except it is because the symphony is so beautiful that I feel entirely incapable of playing it worthily. O, what would I not give to be at Cologne this evening! There is a concert at the Kaufhaus, and they will give every variety of choice music."

"Ah, dear sister," returned Friedrich, sighing, "it is necessary to be rich in order to procure such pleasures. Of what use are regrets, where there is no remedy? We hardly can pay our rent. Why think of those things which are above our reach?"

"You are right, brother, yet in playing I am seized with a longing to hear for once in my life good music well executed. But it is useless."

There was something singularly touching in the tone and repetition of these last words. Beethoven turned to me.

"Play for us one more piece—only one more."

He returned to the instrument. The moon-rays entered brightly at the uncurtained window and illuminated his severe and massive brow.

"I am going to improvise a sonata to the moonlight," he said, with a sportive air.

He contemplated a few moments the heavens sown with stars, then his fingers sought the keys again, and he commenced in a low, pensive, but most exquisite strain; the harmony coming out of the instrument softly and evenly as the light of the moon is nightly shed upon the earth. This delicious overture was followed by a sprightly, fantastic morceau, that seemed fitting for a fairy dance upon the greensward. Then came a rapid agitata finale, a movement palpitating, tremulous, precipitant, describing flight and incertitude, a vague, instinctive terror which bore us on shivering wings, and left us at its close silent and amazed.

"Good evening," said Beethoven, abruptly, pushing back his chair and moving toward the door.

"You will come again," entreated the brother and sister at the same time.

He paused and regarded the blind girl with compassion, even tenderness.

"Yes, yes," responded he, precipitately. "I will come again, and will give the young lady lessons. Good evening—I will come again soon."

They followed us to the door in silence more eloquent than words, and remained standing on the sill till they could no longer see or hear us.

"Let us hasten to my room," said Beethoven to me in the street; "let us hasten, in order that I may note this sonata before I forget it."

We entered, and he remained writing long after daybreak. Such is the history of the Sonata to the Moonlight, which is so much admired.

What of blind Beatrice? Beethoven fulfilled his promise to become her instructor; her improvement was even beyond what could have been anticipated. In a short time she received a few pupils, and when it became known that her talent had been guided by the great master—whose star was now risen never to set—applications counted ten-fold more than could in any wise be entertained.

I must ever remember the expression of childish joy and unutterable thankfulness with which Beatrice welcomed her noble friend, when one fair morning of the following spring, we once more entered her home together. Coming up to him, she put into his hands, without his suspecting her intention, some gold coins, the first meed of her efforts as instructress.

Beethoven glanced at the money and returned it with gentle force, clasping the white fingers over it and retaining the folded hand in his own. How holy a look was that which gleamed from his features! it was the balm of all beautiful emotions. I know that Beatrice's spirit eyes beheld, and that her soul was sweetly laved.

"Do not—you will not refuse it," pleaded Friedrich, advancing to us with a half-made shoe in one hand; "you, who have made us so rich in happiness. Shortly we may be able to reward you further."

"Say no more—I do, and shall decline such reward now and always," replied Beethoven, decisively, though I was at a loss to know how the eloquence of the two could prevail.

"Friedrich, be you your sister's steward, since gains embarrass her; and in proportion as these increase, procure yourselves the comforts of life. Take Beatrice to a congenial home, and allow Beatrice's brother some hours of relaxation from labor each day." He paused, and turning slowly to me, added—"You could tell how it is, I who am under obligation to them."

I comprehended, and having moved the group to seats, rehearsed minutely the incidents of the earlier part of the evening on which had commenced in this very chamber the acquaintance, which since, on both sides, was ripened into deep and abiding friendship. I did not spare my friend, being desirous of presenting to his sober vision a portrait of himself in his unnatural moods, such as would bring into disfavor their indulgence. Yet, afraid of the effect of my boldness, my eyes turned to his face in questioning glances as I proceeded. When all was told, he looked round upon us thoughtful and half-amused, and addressing Beatrice, said:

"My dear girl, you have just heard what was my appearance in those dark passages of my life, but no one, not even I, can express what were my feelings. It is you who with silver cords lifted me as from out a pit into which I had fallen; when I cease to distinguish between midnight and meridian in the soul, I may grudge the free gifts I have bestowed on you."

BARKING OF DOGS.

The Australian dog never barks; indeed, Gardiner, in his "Music of Nature," states that "dogs in a state of nature never bark—they simply whine, howl and growl; this explosive noise is only found among those which are domesticated." Sonnini speaks of the shepherd's dogs in the wilds of Egypt as not having this faculty; and Columbus found the dogs which he had previously carried to America to have lost their propensity to barking. The barking of a dog is an acquired faculty—an effort to speak, which he derives from his association with man.

with perfect sans froid, rising, he bowed and said: "Pardon my intrusion. I regret that it was necessary, and regret, as much, that my dream of New England hospitality (of which I have heard so much) is broken. Good evening."

"No, no!" said she. "I beg your pardon. Do not let me break your dream. Your proceeding is unusual—more unusual to me, perhaps, from my perfect retirement, than to others. But allow me to extend you that hospitality, sir; pray do not refuse it. I am quite ashamed; but though I do not care for a customer, I am at liberty to receive a guest, and offer you a New England welcome, though a late one."

But the stranger did not seem at all inclined to be solicited nor prevailed upon, till Dr. Brown took the case in hand, assuring him that since he must finish his business, there was no other resort for him—every place in town was full, and of course no woman would take in a perfect stranger without hesitation, and sending for his trunk, bade him make himself easy for three weeks, till the tavern was empty, and good night.

Installed in the best chamber—whose one-trellised window was just green with the curling woodbine, and the simplicity of whose black walnut and white marble furniture was only relieved by vases of flowers and a painting of the hostess when she must have been in the first blush of girlhood, but infinitely less lovely than now—the stranger suffered the fragrant smoke of his cigar to curl out across the garden, while he sat in a reverie at the window till aroused by the entrance of his servant, who slept in an adjoining closet. But pretty Mrs. Stanhope sat below in a flutter of trepidation at so unwonted an occurrence, lamenting the loss of her seclusion and the breaking up of her little feminine routine, and the next moment blaming herself for so inhospitable a spirit.

"Well, mum," said Peg, "some ud call it seeking hostility, and some larking round. For my part, all I hope is, he wont run off with the teaspoons and the yellor Carry marble vases."

"He doesn't look like that," said the mistress.

"P'r'aps not. However, I wouldn't trust to 'pearances, and I shall just slip the bolt outside his door at night!"

"No, no, Peg—on no account!"

"Well, mum, just's you say!"

But Peg, an old and privileged servant, did slip the bolt, occasioning some wonder next morning, a blushing explanation from the hostess, a hearty laugh from the guest and an accession of ease on both sides. "Though I'm sure," thought Mrs. Stanhope, "it wasn't necessary, as far as he is concerned, for I never saw such a free and easy person in my life. I believe if I had denied him altogether, he'd have brought that horse into the drawing-room itself, and stayed whether or no!"

But Mr. Henry was absent the most of that and the two following days, so that she experienced little interruption in her pursuits, and did not at all regret the innovation. On the fourth day, Dr. Brown made his appearance, with considerable panting, and at last finding a resting-place for his mighty mass of flesh, he deposited his hat on the floor between his feet, wiped his red face with a yellow handkerchief, which he then threw with considerable dexterity into the hat, buried his elbow in his knee and said: "Good morning, Mrs. Helen. How do you get on?"

"O, very pleasantly indeed, doctor."

"No great interference—eh?"

"Not much. Who is he?"

"You know as well as I do. An Englishman, I guess—said he'd recently left the water. Dark enough for a nigger!"

This last remark was almost true, for the very dark, Spanish brown of his complexion would have caused a suspicion of a wash from the decoction of walnut bark, if the black moustache and long sweep of very black hair over a low, broad forehead, had not qualified the skin. The eyebrows, too, remarkably thick and black, overhung large black eyes; but in the face of so much blackness, he had white teeth, a pleasant smile, fine figure and agreeable manners.

"Something about his voice strikes me disagreeably," remarked Mrs. Stanhope, "but it's no matter—it wont be for long."

"I don't know, Mrs. Helen," replied the doctor, "but what it will be a good thing, for when he is gone, you'll miss masculine society and be all ready for another occupant, and I don't know but what I might ask you then to take me in. I think you'd do it."

"What! what! what!" cried she, turning upon him like a shrew.

"Bless my heart! what a savage little female! Can't she tell when a man's in joke?"

"I am not accustomed to be joked with thus. However," laughing, "it is as well you weren't in earnest!"

"What would you have done, if I had been?"

"Called in the other physician, young Dr. Lancet," was the reply, as little Kate ran in with a gash on her forehead, and setting up a monopoly in roaring, Dr. Brown's pocket-book immediately produced a piece of sticking-plaster which the doctor applied with a great degree of nicety and some waste of time; and Miss Kasy appeased with an enchanting jelly patty, the fat, amatory doctor took his leave.

At dinner, Mr. Henry inquired with considerable interest into the cause of Katy's accident, and when, afterwards, as he sat in the drawing-room, one elbow on the window, his handkerchief on the knee whose foot rested free and easily on another chair, he continued watching the children somewhat gloomily, Mrs. Stanhope became quite uneasy to know if he intended kidnapping her treasures, or strangling them. Catching her eye, he smiled and said: "Do not fear. I shall not play the part of Saturn, madam."

Coloring and laughing, as she saw how ridiculous her surmises were, she replied: "I am afraid you have put yourself into very foolish company—" and stopped half way.

"A fool's paradise then!" he laconically answered, while ransacking his pockets, he produced two magnetic harlequins, which, after an unrivalled series of gymnastics, got legs, arms, fingers, toes and noses so delightfully agglomerated that it became a day's work for the young ladies to disentangle them. "Well, Mrs. Stanhope," as he still perceived her regarding him attentively, "am I a fiend?"

"Not Saturn and hardly Satan!" she returned.

"Ah, for such a poor quibble you must be punished by a worse one," he answered, glancing at Dr. Brown, who was just entering, plump and rubicund as ever. "I see you are infatuated."

"Rather he is," she merrily replied.

The doctor had come up to see Kate's hurt, which mighty wound having been dressed only a few hours since, it was fair to conclude was not in a state of mortification. He furthermore informed Mrs. Helen that he had concluded to marry Peg, his housekeeper's sister, if only to spite his housekeeper; but both Mrs. Stanhope and Mr. Henry thought Peg's acquiescence doubtful, and then Dr. Brown indignantly turning to the lady, avowed that all the town were talking about her having this stranger here, and she had better send him off. Thanking him to attend to his own affairs, Mrs. Helen asked if she should send for Peg and the rector, and have the ceremony performed at once.

"No," he said, looking at Mr. Henry, "he'd wait and have two birds killed at one stone."

Mrs. Stanhope didn't see why he wanted to kill either of the birds—she should think he had practice enough upon human beings; and Mr. Henry quoted the old line about "winging Cupid's dart with feathers." The conversation was somewhat enlarged by the entrance of a superb greyhound, which led the doctor to lament his own.

"I can't have any more butcher's sausages," said he, "since I lost that dog; it would be cannibalism. So, Mrs. Helen Stanhope, one of my errands here was to ask your recipe for home-made ones. That dog—I used to have a peculiar whistle for him, which he always minded and which I never employed for another purpose. Two or three days after his disappearance, I was passing a market-stall and by the merest accident gave this whistle. Judge of my emotions when a whole string of sausages rushed out and ran after me pell-mell!"

Somewhat disgusted, Mrs. Stanhope hastened, with all the gravity imaginable, to hand the doctor her recipe and wish him good afternoon, that she might dress herself for a drive along the river banks with Mr. Henry. Thus the days passed pleasantly enough till the three weeks elapsed and the hotel became empty, when the stranger insisted, notwithstanding her kind entreaties, upon leaving her roof. He had informed her of his pursuit of archaeological information, an occupation in which she herself could afford him much valuable assistance. He was, moreover, as she discovered, a gentleman of refinement, extensive travel, superior education, and as she judged, of considerable property. On the day he was to leave, he rode over to the next village, and returning in the evening, led his horse up the hill to meet Mrs. Stanhope at the gate and offer her his thanks for her past hospitality. As he stood there in his negligent, easy manner, on the other side, Mrs. Stanhope suffered him to finish his acknowledgments, and then said: "But the landlord came up this afternoon and requested me to furnish you a home for the remainder of your stay, because a new invoice of guests wanted all the room he had—and that is not much in a country inn—if you would be so obliging. I don't see but what you'll have to succumb to destiny."

"I don't see," said he, "but that I shall."

"Then it is quite settled?" she asked.

"I do not wish to intrude longer on you. I must have been a great displacer of time-honored landmarks already, and have created, I fear, unwelcome disturbance."

"Not in the least. You have been a very agreeable guest. Three weeks have slipped away imperceptibly, and you have opened a new field of delightful study for me. I shall be only too happy to have you accommodate the landlord!" Her dignified manner half melted, her lovely countenance attested her sincerity, and warmly shaking her proffered hand, Mr. Henry gave the reins to his servant and entered with her the cheerful tea-room.

"O, mama," whispered little Nell "is Mr. Henry going to stay?"

Her mother nodded.

"O, I am so glad!" said Kate, not at all inaudibly; "for Peg said if he didn't, you'd mope yourself to death, like that robin in the pear-tree that lost its ma—"

A sudden spoonful of sugar filled and stopped Kate's mouth, and after putting butter on the strawberries and pouring tea into the cream-pot, Mrs. Stanhope glanced confusedly up and met Mr. Henry's eye fixed rather steadily upon her. Coloring up to her forehead, she waited a moment, and then could but lean back in her chair and laugh, while Mr. Henry, taking the infection, joined her merrily enough.

"I am afraid Peg judges without her premises," said Mr. Henry.

"Peg was afraid, that first day, that you would steal the teaspoons!" added Mrs. Helen, with another laugh.

"And I was equally afraid Peg would do me some greater mischief!"

"And what was that?" But her guest was suddenly silent and grave, and she turned to other subjects.

One day, when the weeks had slid into the months and the raging heat of July was at its height, Mrs. Stanhope took a book and, with Peg and the children, went up the hill into the grove behind the house. Mr. Henry had gone out hunting at sunrise and was not yet returned. The servants were scattered, the greyhound, with his red tongue hanging out of his mouth, lay panting in the doorway, and, except when he shook himself with a snarl, everything was still in the heat of the sultry noon. They had sat about an hour in the comparatively cool shade—Peg at her sewing, the children tumbling round a few rods distant, and Mrs. Stanhope deeply engrossed with her book, when the former started to her feet, screaming: "O Lod, mum! the chillen! the dog! he is mad!"

Mrs. Stanhope threw down her book and started up. The hound, with foaming jaws and bleeding eyes, was tearing forward directly in the path of the children. A more dreadful sight could not have been conjured up. She lost her presence of mind entirely, and rushed blindly forward to her children.

"Stop—all of you! where you are!" shouted a stentorian voice on the brow of the hill.

Instinctively she obeyed. A flash, followed by a heavy crash through the sultry air, a bullet whizzed by them, and leaping from the ground with a sharp shriek, the hound fell again with his brains scattered round him, and bounding down the hill, Mr. Henry received in his arms the fainting form of the mother so suddenly relieved from such terror, and bore her into the cottage, while Peg followed with the crying and clinging children at a slower pace. When she revived, Mrs. Stanhope found herself alone with Mr. Henry, who was laving her forehead alternately with cologne and kisses, although she was quite unconscious of the latter application. Too weak to utter a word, she could only press his hands and thank him with speaking eyes, ere both the rescued juveniles, followed by Peg in a vastly more gracious spirit than ever before, entered.

"God bless ye, sir!" said she, saluting him with her hard, horny hand. "I beg your pardon about the spoons. It's naught but good's come to us with ye, sir! and it's no use resisting God's will any longer!" With which closing remark Peg meant it to be understood that she withdrew her opposition, and which, as her mistress was not at all aware of it and there did not seem to be much to oppose, was very considerate indeed!

While they were all in this tale-telling posture, a step smothered itself in the door-mat, and Miss Patty Rogers entered among them unheard—a maiden lady, who was no exception to the genus among which she was classed. Mr. Henry, with his hunting-cap and his game flung on the floor, was still bending earnestly over Mrs. Stanhope, who with one hand covering her eyes, yet suffered him to retain the other. Peg's attitude, and the distressed children, all added to Miss Patty's amazement, and stealing out again very quietly, she began forthwith a round of visits, relating the extraordinary doings at Mrs. Stanhope's, and her own assertion that she "had always said no good would come of that woman's keeping herself so high and dry above all others—with all the parsons and doctors raving over her." Having made herself very happy, she next day called again on Mrs. Stanhope, hoping to glean a few ears from the abundant harvest of yesterday. Finding her alone, Miss Patty bade her good morning with considerable unction.

"Wish you joy, my dear. When is it to be?"

Mrs. Stanhope looked a little puzzled.

"When is what to be?" asked she.

"The wedding."

"Wedding? where?"

"Why here, to be sure, you innocent Abigail."

"There is to be no wedding."

"No? Then I must say it is highly improper, besides defrauding your friends of a party."

"I really don't know what you are talking about, Miss Patty!"

"Ham—presume not. Well, he is a very good age—should judge just about as old as poor, dear Mr. Stanhope would have been if he hadn't died—a little younger, perhaps!"

Never having seen Mr. Stanhope in his lifetime, this token of affectionate adjectives from Miss Patty was especially affecting. Mrs. Stanhope smiled, and said nothing. After looking out of the window a few moments, Miss Rogers resumed:

"Very good looking, too, Mr. Henry is—would be better, to be sure, if he hadn't such enormous eyebrows, and wasn't so dark, and sheared off those taglocks over his lips. But there's no accounting for tastes!"

"Do you want to see him, Miss Patty?" asked Mrs. Helen, with a pardonable affectation of simplicity.

"Good gracious! no indeed! You don't think I'm going to go to fainting in his arms? Philandering round after young men indeed! How pale you are! Bless me—it's almost dinner time! Brother Jonathan always dines at twelve, and I haven't minced the fish yet! Good morning."

Left alone, Mrs. Helen, in her thoughts, took up the same thread, broken by Miss Patty's visit, which had led her to a slight but partial revelation of the state of her feelings. She knew herself to be interested in her guest, and to feel for him a warm friendship, now augmented by the fact that he was the deliverer of her children from a dreadful death, and had manifested an equal degree of friendship for herself. Her reverie was interrupted by the entrance of the individual in question, with an open letter in his hand.

"My dear Mrs. Helen"—he had long since adopted Dr. Brown's mode of address—"I find I must leave you!"

She laid down her sewing-work and turned very pale, while vainly endeavoring to speak.

"My residence with you," continued he, "has been made only too delightful by your kind attentions, and I can but thank you a thousand times for your hospitality before I go. I must leave very soon—but pray do not let me interrupt!" as Peg, with a budget of matters requiring her attendance, entered.

Her eyes followed him wistfully and in silence as he stepped out upon the verandah, and then, waving Peg away, she sought her own room. Mr. Henry dined alone that day, and considerably later, Peg, who began to discover the state of things, commenced a loud outcry against tobacco smoke.

"Can't stir—always a man round in the house!" Sniff—sniff. "Hum—smoke again!

Smoke here—there—everywhere—'up stairs, down stairs, and in my lady's chamber!' all through the dining-room and the drawing-room—even in my missis—poor missis"—with a sigh—"drawers and boxes! and as for the best chamber, it smells like a smoke-house! Couldn't get the small pox if we tried! Shouldn't wonder if that vally of his took to't desperate. Cigars! cigars! Can't unfold a towel without you feel's if the universal earth was smoke. It's in the coffee and in the homylettes, and even in the garden! Can't smell a flower there for it! Declare, don't remember how a rose smells—what's that song missis sings? train—trill—trail of the serpint is over them all! There he comes—so innocent! Going out into the garden in the dusk, with that red spark, stealing round just as simple, mebbe, as if he didn't know missis was settin' in the arbor! I hope she aint crying, that's all!" And Peg went on with her soliloquy, and Mr. Henry with his sauntering.

Mrs. Stanhope was not exactly in the arbor, but sitting on a bank at the foot of a high trellis covered with climbing white roses, and watching the fading orange of the sky, while she became gradually conscious of a train of light blue smoke over the shrubs, and a delicious Indian flavor stealing in and mingling with the roses. She would have escaped, only he would certainly see her, and not wishing to meet him, retained her seat, trusting to chance. She had discovered more of those feelings—which no properly behaved young woman is supposed to be at all acquainted with, till very suddenly, and after a proposal—since Miss Patty left. When he said he must go, the deadly chill that fell upon her, as she felt she should never see him again, hurt her worse than the fact of his speedy departure, for she saw that she loved, and with customary modesty, could not believe her passion returned. A foot crashed in the gravel behind her simultaneously with a crackling of the rose branches, and looking up, she saw Mr. Henry standing a little behind, on one side.

"Ah?" she said, pleasantly, as he showed her a broken spray of the beautiful roses; "are those for Miss Patty?"

"No," he returned, quite soberly, "they are for my wife."

"Your wife!" Although sitting, she leaned her other hand upon the ground for a pillar of support, lest she should fall entirely. Dreadful blow—his wife! She waited several minutes before speaking. "You never told me," at last she faintly murmured. "You have a wife then?"

"A wife who loves me tenderly, as I believe—as I dare to hope!"

Worse and worse. But from her slight acquaintance, could she have expected any more? Something in his voice struck her as on that first time, familiar and disagreeable, even while—she must confess it—even while she loved him. O wretched little Kate and Nell to have such a mother! By-and-by it passed away, and thought with it. She sat like one stunned. She could not tell how long it had been, when he stooped slowly, and with a hand resting lightly on her head, kissed her forehead. Recollection flashed back. This was insult! She would have sprung up, but strength failed her. He raised her tenderly, added to the insult by gathering her in his arms, pressing her to his heart, kissing both brow and lips again and again, and finally crowned the accumulated impertinences by murmuring:

"Helen, will you be her—that blessing—that wife—who has had as yet only a mythical existence? Helen?"

Where were her pride and high resolve? Far from resenting this effrontery, she only remained where she was—her face, if it could have been seen, radiant with smiles, and whispering a few sentences in much the same incoherent way.

"At last—at last—" he said; but further speech was hindered by Peg's voice, shrill and dissonant, breaking in upon their joy with:

"Ma'am! missis! Missis Stannup, here be Dr. Brown to see you to oncet, ma'am!" And leaving her lover, Mrs. Helen fled into the house and pausing a moment, took off her widow's cap and wove the beautiful roses into her hair.

Dr. Brown had been pacing up and down, fidgetting unaccountably and growing warmer every moment. A furious daw-bug that insisted upon banging against his nose, and which, just captured, was enchaining his attention as Mrs. Helen entered, was flung loose again, while the doctor took a chair, sat down on his hat, got up again and took the hat and bent it carefully into shape. The daw-bug made another dash at his illuminated countenance.

"Go'long, you beast!" said the doctor, indignantly. "Beg pardon, ma'am! meant the bug!" And he took another seat, crushing this time the little can-bottles of the portable pharmacy he carried in his pocket. "The short and the long of it is, madam," he at length enunciated, "that you mustn't do it."

"Mustn't do it? what?" said the happy Helen.

"Why, going and marrying this feller. Because—because, my dear—I want to break it gently—he's got another wife!"

"Well."

"I don't know as to that. He told some one in the village—told Miss Patty Rogers, that he'd bring and introduce her at some time."

"Well."

"And besides, my dear Mrs. Stanhope, you know in that great disaster on the railroad, four years ago, they could identify Mr. Stanhope only by his clothes, and there was a little discrepancy in them which we didn't think of at the time, but which is quite glaring now—quite glaring, upon my word! Why, bless me, there wasn't a cent in the man's pocket, and I practised in the city then, and knew for a dead certainty that Stanhope had drawn several thousands from the bank that morning, and had been selling funds, and not those set by in the will for you, my dear! all the week. And now where did that money go to? Clearly with Mr. Stanhope; and it's not him at all in the vault there, but one Henry Stanley, as well as I can find out. And your husband and you not being much attached, he took the opportunity of clearing out, it seems, and leaving you free to marry again. Now don't go to thinking that I've made myself too busy. You've behaved very well, my dear, but Mr. Stanhope is alive, and has been in Boston lately, and means to come here—been seen there by responsible witnesses, and you'd better ship this feller as soon as you've the mind to!"

"Thank you, doctor. Good night."

"I vow," concluded the doctor, as he walked home, "I can't tell whether she knew it all before or not. Mighty cool, any way! afraid she did. It was a pill to swallow, but then I gave her a comfort after it. And she and Stanhope hated each other, or nearly so, just because they were wanted to love. Hope I haven't been making a fool of myself. Well, she can't marry this smooth Mr. Henry now, that's one comfort."

The doctor's steps had died away, and still she stood there, mute and statue-like, in the centre of the room. Minutes might have been ages—breath itself seemed to leave her—the heart ceased to beat—suddenly the blood spun back and flushed her face to purple—her limbs failed beneath her—she sunk to the floor, half praised on one hand. Wild and distracted, with one long tress of her dark hair streaming loosely, she looked like a Maenad exhausted with prophetic ravings. Peg's decided step became audible in the distance; she entered without a word, and taking her mistress, bore her to her own room and left her on her own bed, muttering: "Well, all things come right in love, they say, and s'pose this'll."

A few moments only Helen lay there, when rising, she began to think of her next step.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

PARTICULAR NOTICE.

With the present number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly we close the fourth volume of the work, and our next number will be Number One, Volume Fifth, bearing date January, 1857. We are gratified to acknowledge the remarkable and constant increase of the circulation of this favorite monthly. Let those whose subscription expires with this year be so kind as to renew at once, that we may print a large enough edition to supply all demands. It will be remembered that we bind the volume of the magazine in neat illuminated covers, strong and uniform in style, at a charge of only thirty-eight cents each. Recollect, this is the cheapest magazine in the world!

SENSIBLE TO THE LAST.

A certain member of the society of "Friends" fitted out one of his ships from New Bedford on a short trading voyage, expecting a return in a few months; but the captain was absent over four years, rendered no account, remitted no money, and, on the other hand, kept drawing on the merchant. After all hope was gone, he brought his ship into New Bedford in a shattered condition, and the "Friend" mildly remonstrated with him. "Take your old craft," interrupted the speaker; "she aint good for nothing—she'll neither wear nor stay." "Friend," said the other, mildly, "for the wearing, thee seems to have worn her out theeself; and for the staying, I thought thee would never come back."

"NOT WORTH A BUTTON."—This is the opinion that most married women have of their husbands. The proof is to be found in the invariable absence of buttons on their shirt-collars.

FRENCH PHILOSOPHY.—A Frenchman's theory of life is summed up in the motto of Sardanapalus—"Eat, drink and love—the rest is not worth a phillip."

VOCALISM.—A common fault of public singers is that their words are almost always unintelligible.

A NATIONAL AIR.

The other day we heard a swarthy proprietor of a hand-organ grinding out "Partant Pour la Syrie (It was Dunois the Young and Brave)," in front of our office. It is execrable stuff when well played, but when extorted from a rickety, hoarse, wheezy, phthisicky organ, perfectly unendurable. Yet this wretched twang, because it was composed by Queen Hortense, the mother of Louis Napoleon, is now the national air of France, and dinged into the ear of the Parisians in place of that glorious battle-hymn, the Marseillaise, which Lamartine called the "fire-water of the Revolution, which instilled into the sense and soul of the people the intoxication of battle." In the Crimean war, the French moved forward to attack the Malakoff under the influence of this organ-grinder's ditty. They were repulsed, and then demanded the Marseillaise. General Boquet could not refuse them, and the music struck up the dearly-loved hymn. The result is a matter of history.

"Says Gortschakoff:
It's time to be off,
They're singing the Marseillaise."

Rushing forward under Bosquet and McMahon, the Zouaves, voltigeurs and soldiers of the line stormed the stronghold of the enemy. So much for having a splendid national air to play. Queen Hortense's sing-song may do very well for an attack on a hen-roost, but the "fire-water" of the Marseillaise alone can carry men victorious through fire and steel.

CORSETS.—These articles of feminine wear, which are displayed in the shop-windows of our modistes so ostentatiously, are said to have been invented by a brutal butcher of the thirteenth century as a torture for his wife. His intention was to take away her breath and keep her from talking. The punishment became so popular that the ladies adopted it in self-defence.

POETICAL.—A young "Shanghai," who has just submitted to the razor for the first time, perpetrates the following:

"Uneasy as the head that wears a crown Feels the young chin, when shorn of its first down."

JUST SO.—Handsome girls are seldom hair-cases—the homely ones have the tin.

MUSIC IN SOCIETY.

Halleck tells us somewhere that the first touches of a piano at a private party—

———"Like signal notes in battle,
Are tones that bid each tongue's artillery rattle."

It is very discouraging to young ladies—who have been entreated, implored, and urged to "favor the company" with a dash at the keys and an outpouring of vocal melody, after she had made the usual apologies and refusals, told how she couldn't play without her notes, and had a dreadful cold, etc., and then yielded gracefully and been led to the instrument,—to find that she is rewarded for her consent and her exertions by general inattention, and that acts, which would be deemed ill-bred in the presence of a paid singer, are indulged in, without remorse, by very gentlemanly and very lady-like persons behind the back of the voluntary performer. If it was generally, as it is sometimes, the practice for the performer to face the company, something like courtesy might be induced. It is very true that when the sonata or the song is ended, all who have't heard the music are very properly enchanted, and there is no lack of such exclamations as "sweet!" "delicious!" "enchanting!" "beautiful!" etc.; but how hollow are such praises under the circumstances!

Very discouraging, we repeat, is all this to the young gentleman who is stating, in distinct musical terms, that his heart is in the highlands, chasing the wild deer and following the roe; or the young lady, who relates her zoological experience in the way of raising gazelles, of whom she never had one to glad her with his bright black eye, but when it came to recognize her and to become attached to her, it was sure to be attacked by the gazelle-ail, and expire, involving a ruinous loss, pecuniary and sentimental! How can a young gentleman persuade himself that a brigand is "on yonder rock reclining," if he hears, beside the gossip of the day, the price of silks and satins, and the hoop question fervently discussed by chattering tongues? "Oft in the stilly night" sounds incongruously when there is no such thing as stillness in the room. We do not wonder that now and then a vocalist requests to be furnished with "an Arab steed," that he may escape from the turmoil which his efforts to please are sure to provoke. But let Signora Screechsalina of the Italian opera be prevailed on to attend a soiree, and to rend the air with her alto notes, then, in the pauses of the vocalization, you may hear a pin drop. This is a serious evil, and calls for reform.

WELL NAMED.—The Parisians call hoop skirts zephyrs—they are rather airy.

A SINGER IN TROUBLE.

Amodio, the singer, is the most rotund, the most jovial, and the most companionable of Italians. Of course so good-natured an individual is the butt of a good deal of floating wagery in his circle. Last year he left Newport, leaving a little debt of about seventy-five cents unliquidated. The past summer he alighted at the same place from the steamboat, and proceeded toward the Fillmore House, careless and gay, and joking with his companions, all unconscious of any impending evil. Suddenly there emerged from the shadow of the old store-house two dark-browed men. One of these folded his arms and looked scowlingly on with a melodramatic aspect, while the other tapped him on the shoulder and said, sternly: "Signor Amodio, you are my prisoner." "Prisoner!—vat for?" said the astonished Italian. "For debt." "O, I have forgotten him! For seventy-five saints, is it not? I will pay." And he pulled out his wallet. "Tell him to put up his money," said the melo-dramatic partner in this scene; "and away with him—to the dungeon! Load him with the heaviest chains—and let outraged justice vindicate her claims." It is needless to say that the joke was not carried much farther, that the officer and his employer were confederates, that the signor was released, and joined heartily in the laugh created at the hotel when the adventure was related. When the Signor Amodio left Newport for New York he took care to leave no "seventy-five saint" creditor behind him.

ERRORS OF TYPE.—Some of these "mistakes which will happen in the best regulated" establishments are quite amusing. The title of a once popular song, "While all in tears we went on shore," was set up "Whale oil in tierces went on shore;" slightly altering the meaning of the author.

THE RULING PASSION.—A punster at the point of death declined eating a piece of pullet, which he was advised to do, for fear it might lay on his stomach: sacrificing grammar for the sake of punning at that awful moment.

AN EXPEDIENT.—A dashing and fashionable widow up town says she thinks of suing some gentleman for a breach of promise, in order that the world may know she is in the market.

POLYGLOT PAPER.—A Russian newspaper has just been started in London which is printed in alternate columns of English, French, Spanish and German.

THE FRANKLIN STATUE.

The bronze statue of the great, good and wise old man, who conferred undying glory on his native city, is now a "fixed fact." In the heart of this busy metropolis, in a thoroughfare trodden, early and late, by the feet of daily thousands, stands the venerable old man, almost reciprocating—to use Mr. Winthrop's idea—the greetings of his countrymen. The grand procession that went up like a vast wave to the inauguration has ebbed away, and the echoes of its thunders have died on the ear, but have left us this material fact—this art-embodiment of an immortal spirit. The cities of Europe have their patron saints—we have now our guardian genius. Art is never better employed than when translating into the language of common use the glorious traditions of national glory. Without these effigies of great men, there would be something mythic in the popular idea of them. Of Franklin, indeed, we have, perhaps, a more vivid conception than of any other man of America's heroic age, with the single exception of Washington. But we have to remember and to provide for our successors. As the gulf of time broadens between the past and the present, we have to fix the features of the former imperishably, and to cultivate by every adventitious aid the memory of all of it that is worth preservation. The presence of Franklin in imperishable bronze will lead thousands to study his life and works, who would otherwise cherish only a vague respect for his name. And no man's life and works can be studied with more profit—particularly at the present day—than those of the illustrious printer, philosopher, sage, statesman and patriot. His calm, consummate reason will rebuke the mad, brilliant, bewildering theories of modern metaphysical and political theorists; vapory transcendentalisms will vanish like mist when exposed to the bright sun-rays of his clear intellect. The crazy rage for gambling speculations will meet with a calm rebuke in his sound social maxims and proverbial expressions. The son of toil will lift his head higher as he walks in the presence of the man of all others who dignified labor in his own person, and taught the artisan his power and resources. We hail the inauguration of the Franklin statue as an event of immense importance.

NEW YORK.—The number of voters in the Empire State, according to a statement in the census department, is 651,821.

A-BRIDGING IT.—A new bridge, half a mile long, is to be built over the Potomac, at Washington, by the United States government.

THE RULING PASSION.

The death-hour often, though not always, elicits from the parting spirit some manifestation of the ruling passion that swayed it in its earthly career. The dying botanist babbles of strange flowers; the expiring seaman whispers of his "home on the ocean wave;" the flattered beauty of dress and worldly vanities.

"One would not, sure, be frightful when one's dead;—And, Betty, give this cheek a little red."

On his couch in the lonely island of his exile, the spirit of Napoleon flew back to those "combats of giants," in which he won fame and empire, and the "head of the army" were the last words on his lips. His devoted Josephine died thinking of her love. "Elba! Napoleon!" were her last words. An old schoolmaster died conjugating a Greek verb. A sailing master in the navy gave up the ghost, exclaiming: "They're reeving that rope through the block the wrong way!" "Remorse!" was the last utterance of John Randolph. "Have I acted well my part?" said the dying Roman emperor. His friends replied in the affirmative. "Then," said he, "valet et plaudite—farewell and applaud!" And with this thought of his glory, his eyes closed, as the curtain falls on the completed drama.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.—Any person desiring to receive a sample copy of our illustrated journal can do so, free of charge, by sending us a line by mail. Ballou's Pictorial is finding its way into every family circle from Maine to California, delighting all with its numerous and graphic engravings, and deeply interesting with its original tales, sketches and varied reading matter, contributed by the best male and female writers in America.

POPULATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT CLOSE OF 1857.—At the close of 1857, the total population of the United States, upon the supposition that its average ratio of increase has been maintained, or nearly so, may be computed to be, in round numbers, about 30,000,000.

THE OPERA.—No opera troupe can be said to be sure of success that has not a live countess in its ranks, and Vestrali has secured one for her Mexican company, the Countess Tasca Tacani.

MARK HIM.—The man that hates music and children's laughter is invariably an old bachelor, and, if rich, a miser.

GOLD.—The total export of gold from California foots up rising $30,000,000 for the past seven months.

Foreign Miscellany.

It costs about $100,000 per annum to keep the London parks in order.

In some parts of France the young girls become haïresses by selling their curls.

The cashier of the Northern Railroad of France lately absconded, a defaulter to the amount of 1,000,000 francs.

Henry B. Squires, the American vocalist, has been winning new laurels in Naples. He will shortly return to America.

The London Statistical Journal says the national debts of Europe amount to nearly two thousand millions sterling.

The Belgian government has offered a reward of 10,000 francs for the discovery of a non-alimentary substance to be substituted for starch.

The Russians have commenced to manufacture rails for their railroads, and they are said to be superior to the English, although somewhat dearer.

Cholera is disappearing from Madeira; 5000 persons had fallen victims in a population of 16,000. At Funchal the deaths are now no more than five or six daily.

A new lecturer, after the style of John Wilson, has sprung up in England; he has created quite a furor in Birmingham, by singing the Jacobite and other melodies of Scotland.

The banks of England and France have completed an arrangement by which the former draws gold from the latter as long as it may seem safe to do so.

The decimal system of weights has just been adopted throughout the whole of the Prussian monarchy, as it had before been in the German Association, and in several States of the south of Germany.

The American ship Ocean Home and the Cherubim came in collision, recently, off Lizard. The former sunk in twenty minutes, taking down seventy-five passengers. She was from Rotterdam, bound to N. York, with immigrants.

The London Open Air Mission have two hundred and fifty services out of doors each Sabbath. The preachers are now gaining admittance to the "common lodging houses," and meet with great encouragement among the poor.

A French surgeon maintains that far-sighted or near-sighted persons may acquire the perfect power of vision by mere practice. He asserts this as the result of his own experience, and condemns the use of spectacles as injurious.

The London Times, in speaking of the degeneracy of the pulpit, closes thus: "We ask for no polished periods, but simply for burning thoughts, couched in simple and homely phrase, such as those which, in other days, drew man from earth to heaven."

The restoration of peace has given a new impetus to the extension of railways in all parts of Europe. Not only is Russia projecting a grand cordon of railways, but France, Germany and Austria are likewise aiming at railway extensions scarcely second to the numerous projects devised by British capital.

An American inventor has patented an intensely brilliant electric light in England.

The "absorption" of the Indian kingdom of Oude by England is a wholesale robbery.

The late coronation of the emperor of Russia was the most splendid pageant of modern days.

The old punishment of the stocks has been revived in England.

The Emperor Napoleon's pocket money is $3000 a day.

It is found that 536 persons die yearly of poison in Great Britain.

A new British convict settlement is to be established in North Australia.

It is reported that the Czar is about to effect a full understanding in religious matters with the Pope.

It is reported that France wishes to purchase from Denmark a strip of the coast of Iceland for fishing stations.

The London Post, government organ, recommends the Hudson Bay territory as a seat of convict establishments.

The Sultan has now organized a fine orchestra in his harem, composed entirely of female performers.

The London News says: "In Italy, neither God nor man can longer tolerate the iniquities of the crowned oath-breakers of Naples."

A new work, from the pen of Thackeray, who is now on the continent recruiting, is expected to commence, in serial form, about the 1st inst.

The number of sheep in the British Islands is estimated at 35,000,000, worth $250,000,000! producing 157,000,000 pounds of wool, worth $50,000,000, annually.

The Presse, of Brussels, states that Mdlle. Johanna Wagner, the celebrated singer, has been married to M. Jochmann, the son of a millionaire, of Tilsit.

It is said that the Sultan is to be made a knight of the garter. Perhaps this will be Lord Palmerston's way to insure his conversion to the Christian religion.

The population of Paris, according to the census of 1851, amounted to 1,053,262 fixed residents. It is now 1,178,262. The increase has, therefore, been 150,000; but it has been more considerable in the suburbs.

A remedy has been at last found for the odium—the disease which has done such extensive damage to the grapes in Europe the last few years. The remedy is sulphur, lightly distributed over the diseased plants.

The eldest son of the Prince de Canino has presented the Emperor Napoleon with a most valuable work; it is the only existing copy of the statutes of the Order of the Golden Fleece, having the arms of all the knights of the time of King Joseph, who brought it from Spain.

PHOTOGRAPHIC BANK NOTES.—An artist of Paris, M. Agnado, has succeeded in deceiving the most expert clerks in the Bank of France with photographic copies of bank notes. It was found to be impossible to tell the copied from the original one thousand franc note.

Merry Making.

What isle do maids steer for? Isle of Man.

Where should gardeners go? Botany Bay.

Flowers are very warlike in their disposition, and are ever armed with pistols.

An artist need never starve if he is fond of canvass backs.

Annual flowering plants resemble whales, as they come up to blow.

A country dentist advertises that "he spares no pains" to render his operations satisfactory.

An intelligent lady used to say that "carelessness was little better than a half-way house between accident and design."

Let a woman once think you unconquerable, and, unless she is unlike all other women, she will still want to conquer you.

A punster at the point of death being advised to eat a piece of pullet, declined, saying, he feared it might "lay on his stomach."

An eminent artist is about getting up "a panorama of a lawsuit." It opens with the year one and closes with doomsday.

The chap who took the thread of life to sew the rent of a house, has gone West and invented a patent point for cross-eyed needles.

"That, sir, is the Spirit of the Press," said Mrs. Bigelow, as she handed a glass of cider to her neighbor, Mr. Brown.

The man at the corner has just seen a letter of a life-pill proprietor to one of his best customers, which was ominously signed, "Yours till death."

A Western writer thinks that if the proper way of spelling tho is "though," ate "eight," and bo "beaux," the proper way of spelling potatoes is poughteightedaux.

A lady complaining that her husband was dead to fashionable amusements, he replied: "But then, my dear, you make me alive to the expense."

When Æsculapius applauded Philip, king of Macedon, as a jovial man who would drink freely, Demosthenes replied, "that it was a good quality in a sponge, but not in a king."

"What possessed you to marry that dowdy?" said a mother to her son. "Because you always told me to pick a wife like my mother," was the dutiful reply.

A musician gave as a reason for leaving an orchestra, that he never was at rest among such discordant performers; the violinists were always getting into scrapes, and the trumpeters and drummers constantly coming to blows.

A fashionably dressed lady of the present day, about to enter her carriage: Impudent Boy—"I say, Bill, come and see the conjuring; here's this here gal agoin' to squeeze herself into that ere room!"

Peter Cunningham was once telling before Douglas Jerrold of a strange dish he had just dined on. "Such a dish! Nobody could guess it." He of course provoked the query, "What was it?" "Calves' tails," said Peter. "Extremes meet," exclaimed Jerrold.

Why is an actor like a chimney? Because his worth depends upon the way he draws.

Crossing sweepers' brooms last double the time, since ladies' dresses have been so long.

A venerable old man says: "Let the slandered take comfort—it's only at fruit trees that thieves throw stones."

They are particular in Schenectady. A boy was arrested on Monday for spitting into the canal.

A baker has invented a new kind of yeast. It makes bread so light that a pound of it weighs only four ounces.

A southern editor thinks his children are cherubim and seraphim, for, he says, "they continually do cry."

All a man has to do in these days to pass for a genius, is to button his coat behind and wear his hat wrong side out.

It is decidedly provoking to have a fly light on your nose just as the daguerreotypist pulls out his watch and says "Now."

What's the difference between a bantam cock and a dirty housemaid? The one is a domestic fowl, the other a foul domestic.

There is a firm in New York, the name of which is Lay, Hatch & Cluck. The clerks are presumed to be all Shanghai.

A modern writer thus defines honor: "Standing fire well, and shooting a friend whom you love, in order to gain the praise of a few others whom you despise."

A gentleman once observing that a person famous in the musical profession led a very abandoned life, "Ay," replied a wag, "the whole tenor of his life has been base."

We direct the attention of those Benedicks who have very loquacious wives, to the following notice posted in a wholesale ham store in Pine Street—"Tongues cured here."

A manufacturer in New York has succeeded in making such an improvement in the manufacture of Britannia metal goods that, it is said, he is obliged to warrant them not silver.

In a Dutch translation of Addison's Cato the words, "Plato, thou reasonest well," are rendered, "Just so—you are very right, Myuheer Plato."

A German paper announces that Miss Wagner is an exalted echo of the undeveloped inner-stone of our musical taste, which, if not educated, at least has not been vitiated.

We know a gentleman so extremely refined that he is obliged to leave the room if, when he is dining with a person who has red hair, there happen to be carrots on the table!

"Pompey, why is a journey round the world like a cat's tail?" "Well, I doesn't adactly see any resemblance 'twixt the two cases." "Well, den I sposed I'll have to tell you—because it am fur to the end ob it!"

"So, here I am, between two tailors," said a bear at a public table, where a couple of young tailors were seated, who had just begun business for themselves. "True," was the reply, "we are new tailors, and can only afford to keep one goose between us."

